THE NEW CAPITOL.

Laying of the Corner Stone at Albany Yesterday.

A Terrific Rain-Storm Delays the Proceedings.

The Programme Finally Carried Out Under Difficulties.

Interesting Historical Address by Gov. Hoffman.

A Review of the Progress of the Empire State.

Impressive Masonic Ceremonies by the Grand Lodge.

ALBANY, N. Y., June 24.—A cold, disagreeable rain-storm set in this morning, owing to which the formation of the procession in honor of the laying of the corner-stone of the new Capitol was postponed until 12 o'clock. Several postponements were subsequently made on account of the storm. The procession was started in a drenching rain at 12 o'clock, but marched only over a portion of the route laid down in the programme. At 1:35 o'clock P. M. the head of the column reached the Capitol grounds, and at 2 o'clock the Grand Lodge entered the gate and proceeded to the platform, where the Lodge was opened by M. W. JOHN H. ANTHON, Grand Master. HAMILTON HARRIS, Chairman of the Capitol Commissioners, then opened the ceremonies by an introductory address. He spoke as follows:

MR. HARRIS' SPEECH.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: On the 1st day of May, 1865, the people, through their representatives, decided that a new Capitol building should be erected, adequate to the necessities, and commensurate with the growth and greatness of the State. Commissioners were appointed to execute the undertaking, and they have selected with the approval of the Land Commissioners and this Governor, corresponding with the taste of the age and the rank and refinement of the commonwealth, THIS CAPITOL HILL, in this ancient city, was selected, not only for its central position in respect to the business and population of the State, but also for its commanding eminence and its historic traditions, as the site for the new edifice. Here, on the 9th day of December, 1867, the work of excavation commenced, and proceeded to the depth of sixteen feet below the surface. On the 7th day of June, 1869, the corner-stone of the eastern wing was laid, upon a solid bed of concrete masonry, three feet in thickness. To-day, the basement story, with foundation walls of unsurpassed strength and solidity, having a height of twenty feet above the concrete, and covering an area of three acres is completed, and even now we are about to consummate the enterprise by laying the corner-stone, with ceremonies befitting so great an occasion. One-fifth of the work has been accomplished, and if the people shall coincide in opinion with the Board of Commissioners, they will not hesitate in appropriating $5 on the instant and most energetic scale, the years will not be many before yonder old Capitol, which was erected at the beginning of the century to supply the wants of a population of seven hundred thousand, will give place to this new one, which shall be worthy the high destinies of forty millions of free million people, and which will stand for ages, the symbol of the resources, the power and the grandeur of the Empire State of the Union.

A PRAYER.

Rev. Dr. RUSSELL HALLEY next delivered a prayer, in which he said:

"Bless our country as the seat of legislation. We have especially to-day to testify our profound gratitude for the importance of that. Believing, as we do, that our welfare is to a great degree the result of the wisdom and integrity of our legislation, we feel that the right selection of such men is essential to the prosperity of our lives, our liberties and our property. Legislation is a sacred trust. Character is a jewel more precious, a pearl beyond all price. Bless, we pray Thee, the men who have agreed to erect this building. Bless the workmen in every department of labor. Bless the majesty of labor. Bless the men worthy of its object. We pray that here may be erected, of such materials, and in such noble proportions, a temple for the people. Which ever in during the years to come, as they arrive to its completion, will be the emblem of the liberty of the State, and the symbol of its power. May it be a place for public gatherings, and the place where the Council of State shall meet. Bless the Governor, the Senate and Assembly, who are now assembled in Flinkster Hill, was chosen. The first act making provision for the Capitol shows that some things could be done as well as others in those days to which we are accustomed to refer as halcyon days, when men were more honest than now, and when all legislation was pure and perfect; when the object of every bill was confined by its title, and not generalized, as sometimes happens in these latter times. When the title was over the title of this bill passed in 1804? Was anyone perhaps? An act to provide for the erection of a new Capitol in the City of Albany." You are mistaken. It was entitled, "An act making provision for improving Hudson River below the City of Albany, and for other purposes." It first directed the management of lotteries established for the encouragement of literature, to raise $30,000, and pay the same to Commissioners for improving the channel between Troy and Waterford, (which you know are above, not below, Albany), and then proceeded as follows: "Whereas the situation of the Capitol and Court-house in the City of Albany, is found by experience to be inconvenient for the transaction of business, and the inhabitants of said city having represented to the Legislature that they are willing to appropriate a lot of ground on the public square of the said city, for a splendid public building for the accommodation of the Legislature, and for a new City Hall, and have prayed that the present Court-house, and the lot used with the same, might be sold, and the proceeds thereof applied toward erecting and furnishing such new State House; therefore, Be it enacted that John Taylor, Daniel Hall, Philip S. Van Rensselaer, Simeon De Witt and Nicholas W. Quackenbush, be appointed Commissioners for the erecting and completing a public building in the City of Albany, &c., which building shall contain sufficient accommodation for the Legislature, the Council of Revision, the Courts of Justice and the Common Council," &c. It further provided that the managers of the lotteries aforesaid should raise by lottery $12,000, and pay the same to the said Commissioners, for the purposes of the Capitol building. Not a word is found in the body of the bill about improving the Hudson River below the City of Albany. It nevertheless bears this indorsement:

IN COUNCIL OF REVISION, April 6, 1804.

Resolved, That it does not appear improper to the Council that this bill should become a law of the State.

GEORGE CLINTON.

How the ears of the Governor and of the Legislature would have tingled under the stings of criticism and lawful indignation would have come up from the partisan Press on either side now, if a Democratic or Republican Legislature of the present day had passed, and the Governor had approved a bill for the erection of the new Capitol, the title of the bill being "An act to provide for the improvement of the Hudson River below Albany, and for other purposes;" to pay nothing of the money being raised, not by tax, but by lottery. Whether the Legislature, or honest and good GEORGE CLINTON, the Governor, who, in the act of 1804, is described as "the person administering the Government of this State," was criticised according to the most approved style of the present day, I am unable to inform you. At the beginning of the present century, the population of our State was but a little more than half a million, and that of this city, its capital, a little over 5,000. A historian enumerates the public buildings then located here as follows: "A Low Dutch church, one for Presbyterians, one for Episcopalians, a hospital, the City Hall, a brick jail, the City Hotel, and a bank, established in 1792." In 1806, the corner-stone of what we now call the old Capitol was laid by PHILIP S. VAN RENSSELAER, then Mayor, in the presence of the Governor, the Judges of the Supreme Court, members of the Corporation, the State House Commissioners, and the leading citizens, as we learn from the newspapers of the day; and, as was then said, with the usual enthusiastic accuracy of such occasions, it was to be built on "improved principles, combining much elegance with great convenience and durability." There, my friends, it stands, to stands to-day, within our view, a monument of what we call the olden time; venerable, and though not yet three-score years and ten of age, full of historic associations, with rich memories of the past of this great and prosperous commonwealth, clustering around it. Almost the whole of our State history, in peace and in war, has been made and written within its portals. There have been raised the voices of the great men of other days, whose names and words and deeds are still fresh in the memory of our people: CLINTON and TOMPKINS, VAN BUREN, LIVINGSTON and WRIGHT, all of them now numbered with the dead. There justice was administered with a firm, well-balanced hand by Kent, Spencer, Thompson, Beardsley, Jones, Savage, Lansing, Emerson, Walworth and others, who made the reputation of New-York law reports world wide. There constitutions have been framed and laws enacted under the benign influence of which this State, during the present century, has grown from half a million to four millions and a half of people—a nation in itself. Where now are all who less than seventy years ago stood where we stand, when the old corner-stone was laid? Probably not one witness of that scene

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE HYMN OF (ANCIENT) MAN.

A SONG AFTER SUNSET.

Have ye known me at last for your father, O children of bimanous breed?
Come turn and be dutiful rather than foster your pride with strange food.
Can ye search out your lineage and span it, or tell the beginning of life,
In the fire-new first breath of the planet, the star of the wrinkle and the strife?
From the day-spring of chaos-mom holy, the cosmical nassion of storms,
The sense of the creature woke slowly through fissured invertebrate forms:
Boneless and cyeless they wallowed in depths of unsearchable seas;
Blindly they caught or were swallowed, half-sentient of craving and ease:
Until in the day's high meridian, the hour of the fullness of time,
Came forth the elect, the Aeidhan, from the conflict of sea and of slime;
And defying fate's mahoe that mocks us there swam on the waters in power
A lord of new life, Amphioxus, full blossom of vertebrate flower.
So scorning the creatures that lack bone and knew not before from behind,
They waxed in the strength of their backbone, each reptile and fish in his kind:
There some longed for heaven's clear heat, and the sun-litten sky's free fire,
They trod firm ground with their feet, fulfilled of their heart's desire;
They cast off their trappings of gills, and were nourished with bountiful air,
And a closer wrought hide than the quills, and scales were made shaggy with hair;
The beast grew mighty on earth in four-footed lordship of beings,
And in air was a noise of mirth and thunder of resonant wings.
In due season I also arose, with fur and a flexible tail,
And ears pointed, as Darwin well shows, I whose children are man and prevail.
As for my offspring, full worn of their hands, with long words in their mouth!
Northward and southward they seek after darkness and hunger and drouth.
Ah for my brown of primeval delight, when a tropical soil
Luxuriant and warm from upheaval bore sustenance aimless of toil!
My days for the most were careless, the ways of my going were plain:
Ye have made yourselves tailless and hairless, and multiplied folds to your braid.
You gather and heap yourselves treasure, to fear for the moth and the rust:
You have tested your world with your measure, to know yourself near and dust:
You live in a clatter and scrimmage of chaffering and cheating and trade;
Ye have made yourself gods in your image, and quail at the gods ye have made.
Stitch after stitch ye go back to sow garments to hide yourselves make:
I was happier with fur to my back when clothing was none to be had.
My palace was built in the frondage that swung to the breezes of Spring:
I sold not my soul into bondage to prophet or preacher or king.
I knew not the pride of your reasons, to sunder the thing from the thought,
But I laughed in the light of the seasons, the joys that the Summer-time brought.
Though you search out the wall of the wind and the conscience of consonant spheres,
Have you skill to recover and find the sense that was massed in mine ears?
Your arts and your music, I grant, were unknown at the Catarrhine date;
But where is the charm of the chant that I sang in the trees to my mate?
To your food you take fire and strange roots, you men of all creatures alone—
Alas the full-handed and fain! alas! did they never crack nuts with a stone?
You gape at your kindred in cages with most insupportable airs,
And dream that by process of ages your wisdom is greater than theirs.
The secrets of stars in their courses, the weight of the sun in your scales,
Their systems and orbits and forces—you may have them for aught they avail.
You may tell which is quickest and slowest, why one thing and not things are thus:
Yet man is of all things the lowest—for Man is a Civilized Cuss.

TOO MUCH ZEAL.

"I say, Susey, suppose we take your brother Frank?"

"Oh, how kind! How very, very kind! Oh, Willie, how good you are! Come here, Sir, directly, and be kissed. Do you know that it has been in my mind for days to ask you if he might come, poor fellow, only I was afraid?"

"Afraid of me, Susey?"

"Too—well not exactly afraid of you, but—you see you and he did not get on well together before our marriage."

"Whose fault was that?"

"Mine, I suppose," said the young wife, archly. "We were so poor, dear, and he so proud. He could not bear to have it thought that he wanted you to marry me because you were rich."

"He might have spoken out and told me so, instead of sneering at me before you because I don't know Greek and that, as he does, and trying to lower me in your eyes. If he hasn't been your brother and a clergyman, Susey, he'd have had his head broken many a time."

"Well, that's all over now, and you must admit that he has been more civil lately."

"Civil, yes; but hang it, Susey, one's wife's only brother might be a little more than civil, especially when he knows, or ought to know, that I want to serve him. He's trotting himself to death because as a curate he cannot go about his work in his own way. I beg him to let me buy him a presentation. No! he does not approve of buying presentations—it's simony. Is he going to wait until he finds a bishop without sons or nephews, or married daughters, or cousins or friends who shall meet him in the street and say, 'Hal! the very man. Come and be a canon with fifteen hundred a year.'"

"Don't be absurd, Willie."

"It is not I that am absurd. Nor is Frank the only muff in his family. He looks like a ghost—is ordered change of air—and yet you left it for my stupid head to think of asking him to join us in our cruise to the Mediterranean."

"I left it to your warm noble heart, my husband, and I have my reward. Oh, Willie, don't you know how nice it is to want something very, very much—to be half afraid to ask for it, and to have it offered without even a hint? Poor Frank is very ill, and if we can only get him to come with us in the yacht—"

"That must be your business. If I invite him he's sure to refuse."

"To please me, dear, ask him yourself."

"Well, have your own way. I'll write directly."

"No, Willie, don't write; go and see him."

So Willie went.

The pith of the above conversation is taken from Mrs. Templar's diary—a wonderfully minute and comprehensive record of our voyage; and which, under certain reservations is now placed at my disposal. In it I find the following entry: "July 2d.—Told Capt. Max that Frank was to be of the party. He made a face. He don't like Frank."

I must confess that this Frank was not a likable person, but you couldn't help respecting him. He was so heartily in earnest. Like many another good, unpractical man, he took the direction to preach "in season and out of season" as literally applicable to the present day, and so did an infinity of mischief to the cause he served with so much self-denial and ardor. You may have gathered from the opening lines of this story what a good fellow Willy Templar was. Lucky dog! With his fifteen thousand a year and a constitution like an ostrich, he had not a thought beyond blessing his pretty wife and enjoying himself; and with him these two things were identical. As soon as I heard he had invited his brother-in-law I made sure he would accept, and I dare say I made that face which Mrs. Templar sets down against me.

But to arrange matters with Rev. Frank was a subject of the deepest diplomacy. He asked for time to consider. He would and he would not. It was only when his sister pictured the advantages he would derive from having seen Rome and Palestine, and added, in her clever way, (she knew him,) "Who can tell what good you may not be able to do, even in such brief visits?" that he made up his mind. It was a well-meant, but most unlucky speech, that of Susey. The chief stumbling-block in her brother's way was that he would be idle. He now saw that he might both save his life and employ it, and in doing so nearly lost it, and all ours as well.

Our party at starting consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Templar, Miss Templar, (Willie's sister,) and your humble servant. Some mysterious business, which he would not explain, detained Frank. He did not care for Paris—where we had agreed to pass a week—and would join us at Marseilles, to which port the Susan, a beautiful schooner of 120 tons, had been sent on to await us.

Of our visits to Malta, Genoa, Naples, I have nothing to say. Our next point was Alexandria, perhaps the most uninteresting city in the East, but which we untraveled ones thought very strange and Oriental until we had seen Cairo. There—at that hotel, which a kind Providence, watchful over poor travelers' comfort, caused to be burnt down the other day—we fell in with an old friend of Willie Templars, Col. Massom, one of those restless beings who are incessantly crying down foreign countries and never remaining more than a month or two at home. To use his own expression, the East was "the greatest swindle out," and yet he had made himself as much at home at Beyrout, Damascus, Constantinople, and on the Nile, as ever he had been in Pall Mall. He spoke Arabic and Turkish like a native, and knew the Holy Land better than a German courier knows the Rhine. Such a guide, philosopher and friend was invaluable. In due time he was enlisted, attested, and shipped on board the Susan, with the rank of Capitan Pasha.

From the hour of our leaving Jaffa until our return to Beyrout Frank had been most uncompanionable. Nothing could persuade him to visit scenes of interest in our company, or even at the same times. We had to wait for him here, push on to overtake him there. Dear, loving Susey explained that we were only sight-seers, and he something more. We grumbled, and were satisfied. Frank's capacity for disagreeing with everyone and disarranging every plan, had entered into the satiline.

By the time we returned to the coast the quails had begun to arrive. Beyrout is not a pleasant residence, and as the Susan required some repairs, the prosecution of which rendered lying on board out of the question, an expedition was planned to a place about twenty miles off, on the sea, where the best shooting could be had. We were to "rough it" in an old half-ruined fort, with the aid of six camel-loads of camp bedding, sparkling Moselle and other wines, potted treasures of all sorts from Morton, and Templar's French cook from the Susan. Accidents will happen in the best regulated "roughing," and when two casks, which we fondly counted upon to contain biscuits, turned out to be gunpowder, Willie was very cross.

The quail were inconstant, as usual; one day we got a hundred shots within a mile of our starting point; the next had not a bird. Still we enjoyed ourselves immensely—ladies and all—and there was plenty of sketching to be done, and the novelty of their life in the old fort amused them. The only drawback was the absence of our Capitan Pasha, who was obliged to remain behind at Beyrout on business for a week. Even Frank was sociable. For the first time in his life, he appeared to be contented with himself and his surroundings.

I dare say, if the truth was known, that old CHARLEY NAPIER was responsible for knocking all military importance out of the fort. What remained of it had served once for a lazaretto, and was portioned off in the usual Turkish style. A square block of solid masonry entered through a massive door, over what had been a moat, but was now half filled up with ruins and rubbish, a small courtyard, leading to a broad, low staircase, and at its top a spacious hall, out of which all the other rooms opened. Such was our dwelling. A table made of two old doors supported on casks, and five wine-cases for chairs—such was our furniture. The ladies had their cots from the yacht, we our hammocks. What would you more? If we had had nothing but our quail, and the good mullet which Templar's coxswain—a cunning hand with a net—brought us every morning, we should have lived like fighting cocks.

* * * * * * *

"How bright the fire-flies are," said Kate Templar, one night, when we had finished dinner, and were grouped round the open window. "See there, in the date grove! They make quite a glow."

"Fire-flies don't give that red light, Katey," said her sister-in-law. "What you see are sparks of a fire. Look, Willie! it's blazing up now."

"You're right, Susey. It is a fire, sure enough," replied Templar. "But what the deuce does it mean? I hope it's not some confounded fellows from the town come to spoil our sport."

As he spoke another fire, and another, and another, broke out in the dark wood, and the distant hum of voices reached us on the night wind.

"By Jove, it's a regular encampment," cried our host. "There'll be no shooting for us to-morrow, Max, unless we want to be bagged ourselves. I've seen that sort of fellow quailing on the Marmora, and they'll shoot a bird right in your face."

"Well," I replied, "the country's wide enough, if there is only a good pass of birds. Let them go their way and we'll go the other."

"Anyhow it's a bore to be interrupted, and we so comfortable," grumbled Templar, lighting a cigar; but I suppose they've as good a right here as we."

The silence which followed was broken by a voice below.

"Is that you, Templar?"

"By Jove, it's the Pasha!" exclaimed Willie, starting up; "and two days before his time! This is jolly."

"Come down—I want you. I want Max too. I—my horse is hurt—I won't keep you ten minutes. Are you quite well, Mrs. Templar? And your sister? Ah, that's famous! Come down like a good fellow, Templar, at once."

We went down, and the first thing we saw in the courtyard was a tall Turk in green turban and flowing kaftan, leaning against a horse, which had certainly in a bad way. As we approached the Turk threw off turban and beard, and there stood the Colonel, looking very pale.

"Why, you old masquerader——," began Willie; but Massom cut him short.

"There is no time for that sort of thing," he said. "I put on this disguise to pass through you blackguards. You will be attacked at daybreak."

"Attacked!"

"Yes, attacked—twenty to one."

"In God's name, what for?"

"Because that precious brother-in-law of yours has been at his old work—abusing the religion of the country."

"Impossible! He cannot speak two words of the language."

"Look here." He held out four papers, printed in Arabic and Turkish, as he spoke. "You remember that he never would keep with us. He would go about alone—and why? To scatter broadcast these precious things. You can't read them, but take my word for it, who can, that there is not an insult he has spared."

"Massom, I cannot and will not believe——"

"No matter; they believe, and that's enough. You might as well attempt to argue with a pack of hungry wolves as with them."

"Who are they?"

"Half Mecca pilgrims, egged on by their priests; half Levantine scum, eager for plunder—about a hundred and fifty in all. It was by the merest chance I heard what was on foot. The whole country is up against you. I had only time to send a message to the Consul and ride off. The thing is, how are we to hold out till help comes? What arms have you?"

There was that in Massom's manner which put a stop to all further questioning. The case was a grave one indeed. Templar and I had each our revolver and about thirty cartridges between us. We had our fowling-pieces, but nothing but quails shot. Crake, the cockswain, had borrowed a rifle from the yacht to amuse himself, and had a fair store of ammunition. Massom had his Tranter and a carbine. The mistake about biscuits provided us with a goodly supply of powder, but ball was sadly wanting. We managed to send the ladies to bed without creating any alarm—for, as Massom said, help might arrive before any assault could be made—and then set to work casting bullets, and loopholing such parts of the wall as commanded the gate, which was strengthened with posts, stones, and props. Meanwhile the unconscious author of our danger slept like a child.

Of course we were obliged to take the coxswain and French cook into our confidence, and bitterly did the latter deplore the destruction of his stewpans, pressed into the service to make potage de plomb à la mitraille.

* * * * * * *

It was long past midnight before we had completed our preparations, and then Massom took me on one side.

"If the lives, and more than the lives of those poor ladies are to depend upon us five," he said, "we have no hope except in perfect coolness and discipline. If we are all to be captains, like the crew of a Greek ship in a storm, we are lost. I am only an old Bashi-Bazouk, and I know the prejudices of you regulars. I have not forgotten Kars. This is no time to stand on ceremony, and I tell you plainly that I have seen more of the sort of thing than you have. If you put yourself under my orders the rest will obey, but I am quite willing to serve under you if you think it for the best. It must be one thing or the other, which is it to be?"

I was half angry with him for supposing I could be such a blockhead as to set myself up on my regular rank in such a case, and assured him that I would not only act under him, but do my best to make the others do so too. He pressed my hand, and there was an end of that question.

"Now look here," he said, "it seems to me that we have done all we can to defend that gate, but they may force it, and then there'd be an ugly rush into the court-yard, which we cannot pretend to face. There's no part of the house which commands it either, worse luck. Supposing you were here with your regiment, and a company of Sappers and all the other luxuries of regular war, what should you do with that court-yard?"

I told him in two words.

"Exactly" he replied. "Get Templar off to bed. Tell him his wife must not suspect mischief—anything by way of excuse—and join me below in an hour."

* * * * * * *

When we had stamped the last flagstone into its place, Massom whispered, "If the worst comes, and I am alive, I will work this. If I fall, you know what to do, and in that case you had better tell Templar. For the present let it rest between us two. They will fight all the better at the gate if they think we have no other chance."

He told me that we could have an hour's rest before daybreak, and tired as I was, I soon fell asleep. In about ten minutes (as it seemed to me) Massom's hand was on my shoulder. "To your post," he said, "those rascals are gathering."

"And the ladies?"

"Are behaving beautifully. Templar has told them some of the truth."

"Where's Frank?"

"God knows. Never mind him. He's no use, except to get people into trouble."

The plan of defense was this. We each had our number and our loop-holes, thus:

No. 1. Templar. Arms, revolver, and shot-gun (breech-loader) with thirty cartridges, loaded with revolver balls cut into slugs, for want of better ammunition.

No. 2. The French cook. Arm, Massom's revolver.

No. 3. Capt. May. Arms same as No. 1.

No. 4. Crake. Arm, ship's rifle.

No. 5. Col. Massom. Arm, carbine.

No one was to fire unless at the word of command from the Colonel. Every man was to load after each discharge, if possible.

It soon became evident that our assailants had not adopted our policy of electing a chief and following his orders. They seemed to thing they had nothing to do but to walk in and cut our throats, and came straggling up to the gate gesticulating and shouting, and firing off their guns in the air as though the place were theirs already.

They were allowed to approach within some hundred and fifty yards, when Massom sprang up into one of the windows, and shouted "Halt!" in Arabic.

"What do you want here?"

"Please God, you shall know soon," replied an evil-looking fellow, with a belt full of pistols, who was one of the foremost. "But if you are not one of those dogs" (Massom still wore his Turkish dress) "come forth, and no harm shall happen you."

"I am an Englishman, and these my friends are English too. Take care. Our Consul knows your movements, and will be here with assistance before your shadow is long. Dogs in your teeth! Dare to approach one step, and I will drink your blood—son of a burnt father!"

"What lies are these, thou of the split tongue?" replied the ruffian, after a moment's consultation with those around him. "It is not well known, that the giaour, thy Consul, departed for the Lebanon two days ago! On, on, my brothers! Revenge our holy religion! There is no God but God, and Mahomet is the prophet of God! There is gold, there is woman, for those who live! There is Paradise for those who die. On! on!"

The immediate surrounding of this fanatic were about fifty men, apparently well armed. They fired a volley which might have deprived us of our leader if he had not jumped down in time and rushed toward the gate. They had nearly gained the tête de pont when our word of command came out, clear as a bugle call:

"Number Four—ready—fire!

Number One—with revolver—ready—fire!

Number Two—with revolver—ready—fire!

Number Three—ready—fire!

Number One and Number Two—with your guns—ready—fire!

One and Two—ready—guns—left-hand barrels—fire!

Number Four—ready—fire!

"Number Three—ready—fire!"

But Number Three had a long shot. Two fell to our first three discharges, and when the word was given to use our guns, the enemy was packed so closely on the ruins of the draw-bridge that every slug of the forty poured out from our four barrels must have told. Had they been not quite so densely packed and a little further off, the effect would have been greater, as our charges would have spread more. But the rout was complete. They had not counted on so warm a reception.

As they fled, Massom raised his carbine for the first time, and their leader, while in the act of trying to rally his men, threw up his arms, and fell.

"M. Jules," said Massom, as coolly as though ordering dinner, "do me the favor to remember that one does not fire six shots and only count two. That is comparative only. Your first shot was a very good one. I congratulate you. But it would have been better one moment later. Crake, put that back aught down. Long shots are no use. Max and Templar, never fire at the front row of a rush. Aim over their heads, into the middle. Remember those lines of MACAULAY:

'Those behind cried, Forward! and those in front cried, Back!'

Pitch into those who are pushing the others on, and there will be no pushing. My God! What's that?"

Well might he cry "My God! What's that?" for over the draw-bridge, and making direct for the enemy, marched Frank Sefton. Vain all shrieks to him to come back. In vain were a dozen pieces leveled at him by our assailants. He marched straight on, waving something white in each hand.

Musselmans, like Indians, have a respect for madmen, and to that respect Frank owes his life. It turned out that M. Jules, our good chef, had not been able to control his feelings, and that early in the morning he had sought poor Frank, and given him what Mrs. Brown would call "a bit of his mind." Ah, what had he done! Into what peril had he brought those dear ladies! He who, after all, was a heretic! So Frank let himself down from a window on the other side of the fort, and taking with him copies of those wretched papers (the printing of which, by the by, was the cause of his remaining behind in London) as his credentials, went out to the enemy to give himself up to their fury, and die to save us.

Unable to speak one word of Arabic, he could not make his intention clear, and, as I have said, was taken for a madman. Moreover, our assailants, whose blood was now thoroughly roused, were in the act of making another rush for the gate, and in this he was borne down.

You may judge what sort of spirit actuated the enemy when I tell you that many who rushed to attack us had no arms at all. In spite of the bloody warning we had given them, these fanatics were ready to dash themselves on the gate, and try to tear it down with their bare hands.

We checked them once, twice, thrice—firing until our arms became so hot that we could scarce hold them. The bridge was strewn with dead and wounded, but others pushed on, and once under the wall were safe from our fire. We had suffered too; of the hail of balls which rattled against the fort, one or two had entered the narrow loopholes; poor Crake had his right wrist shattered, and Templar had a shot in the shoulder. Our ammunition was almost exhausted—as we thought. The din at the gate was awful. They dashed heavy stones against it; they fired their guns into the lock. They found a beam of the old bridge and made it into a battering-ram, and we could see that the timbers began to give. To lean sufficiently far out of any window to fire on the crowd below was simply to offer a target for a dozen balls. Besides, we had not more than five shots left among us. At this juncture, when we had begun to look into each others' faces to see if any one had hope, there came in dear Kate Templar with a lapful of cartridges, and a handful of bandages with which she bound up poor Crake's wrist. She was dead pale, but said not one word except that Susie was busy casting more balls. No one knew then that Templar was hit. It was an immense relief to have that ammunition, but a greater was at hand. M. Jules had retired, as it seemed to me, somewhat improperly. He returned, however, with his largest and best beloved stewpan full of boiling fat, which, with the utmost sang froid, he poured over the top of the gate, thereby exposing himself to a volley. A howl of pain came up from below, and a shriek of rage from M. Jules, as he exhibited his pan pierced by a ball. "Les brigands! A present il ne me reste pas une seule casserole pour faire le déjeuner de madame! It did not seem to strike the honest fellow that madame might not breakfast any more.

But his tactics had their effect. The battering at the gate ceased, and for some time there was a dead silence. We were so intent upon the gate that we did not remark that a band of some twenty or thirty, that we had driven back into the gate grove, had gradually disappeared. They had sneaked round to the south side of the fort, and, passing under the shelter of the wall, had joined their comrades. A thin, blue wreath of smoke, which curled up over the architrave of the gate, showed what was now their plan. They had lit a fire against it, and in a few moments the dry timber would be burned through! We were utterly without defense against this new enemy. The pile of stones which we had raised to strengthen the doors from within, prevented us from throwing water under them; the overhanging architrave protected the fire from above. It blazed brighter and more bright, and louder and more exultant arose the cries of the rabble, now mad with the hope of revenge and plunder, who nourished it with fresh fuel on either side, in perfect safety.

"We can do nothing here," said Massom. "Come down all of you, and help me to make a barricade at the entrance of the court-yard."

"Make it on the stair-head—make it on the stair-head, for God's sake!" cried Templar. "My wife, my sister——"

"Shall be defended to the last drop of my blood," whispered the Colonel. "Trust me. Drag down those boards and cases—the ladies' beds—everything you can move. Put away your arms for the moment. We should have thought of this before, but it cannot be helped."

There are some men one obeys instinctively, and whose energy is catching. Such a one was Massom. In a very short time we had raised a respectable barricade on the spot where the narrow yard led into the vestibule of the house.

"But look here! we must fill up this gap," cried Templar. "Bring that tub, Jules, quick! There's room for a man to pass."

"A man has to pass," replied Massom, quietly, passing out as he spoke. "Now get your arms, but don't fire till I come back. Then blaze away as quick as you can. Never mind reloading; keep them back for two minutes, and then save yourselves. Let there be no mistake. Fire and retreat. Max, give your revolver to Crake (he can use it with his left hand) and take his rifle. Good! Remember my words. Fire, and retreat to the ladies' room."

So saying, he crept along the wall toward the now smouldering gate, and was lost to our sight.

The shouts from outside sounded wilder than ever, but scarcely drowned the roaring and crackling of the fire. Then came a crash, and we were half-blinded by a shower of sparks. The doors had fallen in! A shriek of triumph, a rush, and Massom was with us again, almost in the midst of the enemy, who were thrown back, and massed together by the unexpected obstacle.

"Now then, give it them. Fire! Keep them at bay for two minutes. Fire—quick, quick! The shot galls. Bravo! Well done, Jules! Bricks, stones, anything!—keep them back for one minute more. Is that your last shot, Templar? Now follow me; stoop, that they may not see us. Well done all!"

In those few moments we had fired sixteen balls and four charges of slugs point blank into a crowd of some seventy fanatics. They reeled and retreated, and amid the smoke and confusion could not see that the barricade was left undefended. Thoroughly cowed in the midst of their expected triumph, they stood crowded together in the centre of the narrow court; the foremost, almost every man of whom was more or less wounded, pressing those behind into the fire, which still blazed fiercely at the gate, and the latter struggling on to avoid the flames. Under the feet of this dense heaving concourse hissed the slow match of our mind, and just as we reached the outer room it exploded.

A roar as of a hundred-pounder fired at one's ear, a rumbled rumble and crash, a few screams, and then silence!

At first I thought that the whole house was coming down, and indeed a portion of the roof fell close to where we stood, trying to reassure poor Susie and Kate, who had fainted. Our sudden rush into their presence led them to think that all was lost, and the explosion which followed was too much even for their brave spirits. Poor girls! they had behaved nobly throughout, and we had had little time to comfort and uphold them.

How long we were thus engaged I know not. I was aroused by Massom—who had left us some time after the mine sprang—coming back into the room. I started up, and seized my rifle.

"You need not trouble yourself to load again," he said, "all over. The walls of the court have fallen. Not one man escaped. It's a horrible sight—horrible, but——"

"Good God! Massom, are you hit?"

"Yes; but only a scratch. A musket stabbed me in the back as I was in the act of turning round. That's all. It's bleeding a little, but I'm not much the worse for it. It won't do for her," pointing to Kate, "to see me as I am. Jules can do all I want. Tell her we are saved—that you yourself are safe," he added, with a smile, "and she will soon be well."

It was, indeed, for the best that Kate and her sister did not see him as he was; for his clothes dripped with blood, and he could hardly stand. Massom's wound was a nasty slash; but, to a man of his constitution not dangerous. The coup had slipped on the shoulder-blade. Poor Crake had to have his hand amputated when we got back to Beyrout, and Templar's ball gave some trouble before it would consent to come out of his shoulder. At a conceil of war held by Massom's bedside—the side of the floor where he lay—it was resolved that Jules should be sent into Beyrout for help. Massom's horse was dead lame, but our assailants had left horses and mules in plenty, tethered in the date palm grove. The enthusiastic little Frenchman joyously accepted the service of danger, (for a remnant of the enemy were lurking about somewhere,) and I went off with him to choose a steed, and speed him on his way. The tête de pont was another nasty sight, but Jules was equal to it; and as he insisted upon taking it for granted he would have to fight his way, he levied contributions of pistols, yataghans and guns enough to arm a company, from the dead, as he passed.

This sort of work did not suit me, and I walked on by myself, when I heard a sudden cry from my companion:

"Mon Dieu! Monsieur le Capitaine! Venez-vous vite! Le pauvre malheureux! Il est mort. C'est bien M. Frank, et il est mort!"

It was indeed Frank, but not dead. A chance shot—perhaps that long shot of Number Three—had struck him. There he lay, with the foolish papers, that had caused so much bloodshed, still clutched in his hand.

We carried him back to the fort, and by the time we had done so there was no longer any necessity for M. Jules' arsenal. The Consul had indeed left for the Lebanon, and Massom's letter, stating our peril and asking for help, was delivered to his Vice; but he—knowing the handwriting, and thinking it was on private affairs—scrupled to open it, and sent right and left, seeking Massom, to ask if he could serve him, in the absence of his chief. Not finding him he got anxious, (fortunately for us,) and opened the letter.

Before noon a force of cavalry, with the Pasha of Beyrout himself at their head, galloped up to the fort—now a greater ruin than ever—and at daybreak next morning we had the inestimable satisfaction of seeing the white ensign of the Royal Yacht Squadron flying within a quarter of a mile from the shore, and the boats of the Susan grounded on the beach.—Temple Bar.

ASSOCIATIONS OF SHOE-LANE, LONDON.—One slight but golden thread of association links SHAKESPEARE to Shoe-lane. "It was here that, in 1624, lived a well-known man of his day, JOHN FLORIO, a Waldensian by descent, who, having long taught French and Italian with success at Oxford, was appointed tutor to that hopeful Prince HENRY, son of JAMES I. He compiled an Italian dictionary, and translated Montaigne. In a copy of FLORIO'S Montaigne was, some years ago, found one of the few genuine Shakespeare's signatures. In 1625, when the plague broke out, the old Italian master fled from his house in Shoe-lane to Fulham, and there died the same year, aged about eighty. In Hare-alley, Shoe-lane, prior to the act of Parliament in 1772 for the removal of street signs, (for before that every London shop had a sign, such as you can still see at one shop in Holywell-street,) was held the market for the White Harts, Blue Boars, Golden Crosses, &c. It was here HOGARTH and BONNELL THORNTON collected the materials for their celebrated public exhibition of signs in 1760, an excellent bit of fooling. ISAAK WALTON, shrewd and kindly, used to come to this district from his linen-draper's and sempster's shop, two doors north-west of the end of Chancery-lane. In his Angler he says in his social way, taking the reader, as it were, arm-in-arm, "If you will buy choice hooks, I will one day walk with you to CHARLES KERBYE'S, in Harp-alley, Shoe-lane, who is the most exact hook-maker that the nation affords." In Fetter-lane, or nearer still to his house in Bell-alley, worthy ISAAK would now seek his little barbs of steel, before he set forth for Tottenham and the River Lea.—Belgravia.

FRENCH PEASANTS DURING THE WAR.—If I am asked what was the attitude of the peasants during the war and between the two armies, I reply that their behavior was the most lamentable of all the lamentable spectacles in this unhappy struggle. It is among the peasants that the results of ignorance and selfishness have exhibited themselves in the most striking manner. In the Ardennes the people were not heroic, but at any rate they assisted the French Army, helped the wounded, and were not utterly vile before the enemy; but in Normandy and the Beauce, where I was afterward stationed, the state of demoralization was frightful. The peasants were too selfish to make the least sacrifice for their own soldiers; and thus both from fear and from interest became subservient to the Germans, furnishing them with provisions and other assistance. The people of Bonnières, between Mantes and Evreux, were weak enough to send their letters to the Prussians at Mantes that they might be read before being forwarded to Evreux. With rare exceptions they did nothing for the wounded; but if we happened to be successful in an action, I cannot describe the low ferocity with which they turned upon the Germans, before whom they had so recently been cringing. At Oueques the ambulance had some difficulty in preventing two wounded Bavarians from being massacred by the people. At St. Léonard a peasant actually amused himself with pulling the broken leg of a German, for the mere sake of causing him torture. At Ouzouer the people thronged round a solitary wounded officer, and assailed him with threats and insults of all kinds. And their stupidity was equal to their wickedness. They were constantly mistaking us for Germans on account of our flag, and of the ambulance cross on our sleeves. They were certain that we were in communication with the Prussians, because we were not afraid of them; and accused us of firing rockets to point out the position of the army to the enemy. At Sommauthe they were convinced that the Prussians had come because our ambulance was established there; and at Ouzouer it was believed that we had plundered the wounded, and that our only object in nursing the patients was to make money. I do not deny that devoted hearts, and souls above the common, were occasionally to be met with. I have heard from peasants of both sexes golden words, which will remain in my recollection as long as I live; but the great majority, even when intelligent, are shamefully demoralized, and scandalously profligate, selfish and wicked. Quarrels and scandals rage with fury in the villages, and even in the families themselves things occur which are too sad to be mentioned.—Gabriel Monod, in Macmillan's Magazine.

A HEATHEN FESTIVAL IN ENGLAND.—In the midst of so much modern dissent and of mild attempts at ritualism, there still exists a relic of a worship far more ancient than any ceremony which Romanist observes or ritualist would restore—the worship of the Goddess of Spring, the festival dear to the heart of every "one of Helston," and to very many of West Cornwall, the "Helston Flora Day," or, to give it the popular, which is also the true name, the "Furry Day." This curious festival is held yearly on the 8th May, and as a fading relic of antiquity, a description of it, embodying many past experiences, may amuse those of our readers who, in the rapid whirl of present events, still find time for an occasional glance at the past. On the morning of the 8th the houses of Helston are decorated with flowers, the doors and gateways of many of them with arches made of boughs. In ancient times the people used early in the morning to "fade" or "fadry"—Anglice, go into the country and bring in the flowers and boughs to adorn the town. Even so late as last year the traces of this custom were seen in music and dancing in the streets at break of day and even earlier, which broke the slumbers of those who got their best sleep toward the morning, making them start up and condemn the Furry and its votaries to the limbo of all departed things. The more formal and regular ceremonial, however, begins at mid-day, when a procession is formed, headed by the town constables carrying halberts ornamented with flowers and ribbons; these are followed by a band playing the "Furry" tune; then follows what is called the "first Furry," consisting of the principal ladies and gentlemen of the town and neighborhood two and two after the same kind, dancing to the "first Furry" dance. This dance, not to be seen out of Cornwall, and in fact only in this west part of it, we cannot better describe than by saying it consists of the gentleman giving his partner a slow turn as it in a funeral waltz, and a constant exchange of partners between the two couples who walk next each other, and who are locally said to "exchange" with each other. No tune but the Furry is played. The procession dances down the streets, through certain houses and gardens which from time immemorial have been open to the dancers, through the Grammar-school, across the Bowling-green, until having made the circuit of the town, the party and the crowd which follows them reach the spot whence they started, when they go into the Assembly-room, and finish with a country dance. The same houses are yearly, and from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, have been, visited in exactly the same order. The second party, consisting of the leading tradesmen of the town, is then formed, and observes exactly the same ceremonial in exactly the same order. The third party, of servants and the working-class, follows; and the day's rejoicings finish up with the Furry ball in the assembly-room at the Angel inn. The balance of authorities is in favor of the opinion that the Furry is of pagan origin, introduced into Cornwall by either the Phœnicians, the Greeks, or the Romans, and that it is a rite in honor of the spirit or goddess of vegetation, and in celebration of the return of Spring.—Belgravia.

MOLIÈRE AND HIS TROUPE.—At the age of twenty-two MOLIÈRE finally resolved on adopting the theatrical profession, and first joined one of those temporary companies which began by acting at the fairs, and went on afterward as long as they were not interfered with. The ambitious name of the company was l'Illustre Théâtre. It held together for a year or two, when it was broken up, and MOLIÈRE, with the BÉJARTS and a few more, set off on a journey, which was to last them twelve years, in the provinces. This part of his life, during which he brought out his earlier pieces, made love to Mlle. DE BRIE and MADELEINE BÉJART, learned how to act, and saw the little ARMANDE, his future wife, grow up, graceful and charming under his eyes, was perhaps his happiest time. He went with his comedians from place to place, acting silently in his undemonstrative way the manners and talk of the people. They used to show at Pézenas the chair in which he would sit for hours in a barber's shop, saying nothing, but listening. His taciturnity was, indeed, proverbial. BOILEAU afterward called him le contemplateur, while MOLIÈRE himself alludes to it with grim humor in his Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes. After twelve years of this wandering they had the good fortune to appear before and to please the King, who granted them authority to act in Paris. Here for twelve years more the company played the pieces which MOLIÈRE wrote for them, until his death put an end to their power of cohesion. Two or three years later they were amalgamated with the Hôtel de Bourgogne, which swallowed up shortly after the Theatre of the Marais, and one company, the Comédie Française, grew out of the three. MOLIÈRE was the stage manager, principal partner, orator, author, and chief actor. As a manager, he seems to have been despotic, arbitrary, and irritable. As an actor, he was the greatest artist of his time. MOLIÈRE was comedian from head to foot; it seemed that he had several different voices. Everything in him spoke; and with satire, a smile, a movement of the hand, a dropping of the eyelash, he imparted more ideas than the best talker would have managed to convey in an hour." He did not, however, always undertake the principal parts in his own plays; and while he was Alceste in "The Misanthrope," Jourdain in "The Bourgeois Gentilhomme," he was only Orgon in the "Tartuffe."—Temple Bar.

THE LONDON SEASON.—One peculiarity of the London season is the time of year at which it takes place. In all continental countries, Winter has been the invariable signal for a rush to the capital. In France, this result was attained in part by a little ungentle pressure employed by the able Ministers of early BOURBON kings. It did not suit SULLY, and still less RICHELIEU and MAZARIN, that the great nobles should remain on their vast estates, each Duke the centre of a petty Court, where treasonable projects were readily hatched, and armed rebellions lightly begun. By threats, by cajolery, and by every imaginable artifice, the feudal aristocracy of France was drawn to Paris, so that every minor luminary might add to the lustre of the royal state. But in England, where the power of the feudal nobility was broken at a much earlier date, there was no such reason for compelling the upper classes to pass the Winter in London. The English passion for field sports, the intensely home-loving spirit of the nation, and the sturdy independence of the gentry, contributed to keep the lords of acres in their own manor-houses, where the yule-log was duly burned, the boar's head and wassail-bowl borne jovially in, the tenantry feasted, and the buck or the hare hunted, in compliance with immemorial custom. But in early Summer there were fewer cares, as well as fewer pleasures, to keep knights and dames, the squire and his lady, among their own fields and woods. The corn was sown and growing, and till brown Autumn should come, with its ingathering of harvest and rent, there was little to keep a land-owner in the country. That was the time for the assembling of Parliament; and out of the needs of legislation there gradually grew up what foreigners regard as the phenomenon of a London fair-weather season. One other reason there probably was for the selection of a fair-weather London season; and this had reference to the nature of that stock subject for grumbling, our well-abused climate. Continental Summers are commonly hot. Paris in July becomes a Titanic limekiln, where the white dust of the calcareous stone floats, mote-like, in the golden sunbeams. Vienna is a furnace; Madrid a glaring desert, with yellow houses to do duty for rocks; and even Berlin lies baking in the midst of its shadeless plains of sand. But in England, where the extremes of heat and cold are so rare, May, June and July, can be spent in a great town without inconvenience. It was all very well for the perpetual rather HORACE WALPOLE, to jeer at the English climate, and to write word to his friends that "the Summer had set in with its usual severity." But it is because our island belongs more thoroughly to the temperate zone than any other tract of European soil, that we are able to enjoy a London June, while the inhabitants of foreign cities are gasping like newly-caugh fish.—Belgravia.

MRS. SIDDONS AS "VOLUMNIA."—CHARLES YOUNG was wont to speak in terms of almost wanton admiration of a bold point he saw MRS. SIDDONS once make, while playing the comparatively inferior part of Volumnia for her brother's benefit. In the second scene of the second act of "Coriolanus," after the victory of the battle of Corioli, an ovation in honor of the victor was introduced with great and imposing effect by JOHN KEMBLE. On reference to the stage directions of my father's interleaved copy, I find that no fewer than 240 persons marched, in stately procession, across the stage. In addition to the recognized dramatis personæ, (thirty-five in number,

A HISTORICAL SKETCH.

The Empire State Two Hundred Years Ago.

A great many persons have forgotten, if they ever knew, that New-York City was once called New-Orange; that the Dutch drove the English out of it, to baptize it with that name, and subsequently gave it back to them of their own free will; that Connecticut once sought to make the Hudson River her western boundary; and that New-Jersey was for a time obliged to present her laws for approval to the Governor of this State, whose boundaries once embraced her territory and that of Pennsylvania. These and many other forgotten facts pertaining to the earlier history of the Empire State, are related in the volume whose title we have given above. It comes as second volume of the History, and is to be followed probably by a third; and we are justified in saying perhaps by a fourth, for it is almost a Pre-raphaelite work in its faithful portrayal of minutiæ. This, indeed, gives to it its chief interest. The present volume embraces but twenty-seven years—1664 to 1691. Its facts have been gathered from many authentic sources with patient industry, and an evident care to verify them, and they have been, for the most part, clearly arranged. The marginal indications and dates, and a very full index, give all the facilities one could desire for quick and particular reference. The style of Mr. BRODHEAD is unambitious, lucid, and quietly self-reliant, rising to a pleasant, hearty energy when occasion requires, but not wearying the reader with any continuous intensity.

He has made a book, not only of much historical interest, but that is very agreeable to read. It is almost gossipy; and we should be sorry to exchange its chatty narration for a more dignified statement of merely prominent and important events. In the preface, the author claims an inherited fitness to hold the balance with judicial fairness, inasmuch as he is "descended from an English officer who helped his King to conquer Dutch New-Netherland, as well as from a colonial Hollander who stood up manfully for his republican Fatherland." His New-England readers, however, will probably be disposed to question his impartiality a little. The occasions that rouse him out of his historical calmness, and give passionate emphasis to his more fervid sentences, are usually when the Puritans come in sight. He rates them soundly for "bribing" the courtiers of CHARLES II. to secure what otherwise they could not have obtained, and does the honest rebuking with a hearty jest, and a mingling of taunts and an occasional sneer, with the wholesome discipline; he takes them to task sharply for seeking a safe via media between loyalty to the crafty monarch and a ruinous open rebellion. Their policy "was neither manly nor wise." "The local rulers of Massachusetts" (1661) "knew that they were the creatures of the King of England. Nevertheless they affected a braggart independence of him; and they intrust with controlling powers 'a sectarian oligarchy.' Further on they become "the first secessionists," and are "truculent rebels."

They of Connecticut, too, are cunning and unprincipled. In regard to the enlarging of their territory by carrying its western boundary to the Hudson, "they had the audacity to desire, in very careful words, that the Duke's officers would countenance their attempted swindle." The New-Englanders are "pert," "inconsistent," exhibit "characteristic assurance," are persistent in urging what they know to be baseless claims, and are altogether very uncomfortable and undesirable neighbors.

But these and some other evidences of the superior strength of the Dutch progenitor of our author serve to spice his pages, and will make them the more palatable, we suppose, to many of his readers. It does not mitigate the severity of his censure of Puritan ambition that boundaries, titles and the limits of authority were at this period in a very confused and fluent state. The claims of the French, the English, the Dutch and the Swedish overlapped each other, and were entangled in inextricable confusion; sweeping assertions made by a Government to confirm its rights in one direction, were pressed to the utmost logical sequence by its rival to make good its claims in another direction. The Puritans, with impudent arrogance, called the Hollanders intruders into the territory belonging to New-England, and treated them as usurpers to be driven from the lands they had gained for their New-Netherland, by all available means. But HENRY HUDSON, "in the service of the Dutch East India Company," had explored "the great river of the mountains" in 1609, and "this gave the Hollanders an unquestionable title by discovery which they soon fortified by further visitation and actual occupation." And Queen ELIZABETH herself had said, (in order to sweep away the title of Spain to the parts of North America which she had not explored and colonized,) that "prescription without possession is of no avail." And so, by "manifestable decrees of Providence," this magnificent region was first occupied by a race "less selfish and exclusive" than the English. The greedy Anglo-Saxons however, moved by their "pride and cupidity," and "partly considering New-Netherland 'a thorn in the side,'" were not to be borne away from their very evident interests by a logical inference from the once convenient position of a defunct Queen—not even of Queen Dido;—nor were they to be governed under the unscrupulous CHARLES II., by any recognition of title to OLIVER CROMWELL;—especially when the Hollanders received much tobacco across the border from contiguous colonies, and thus deprived his most Christian Majesty of coveted export duties. And so the Dutch, deserted by the States General, for fear of giving umbrage to England, and threatened with bombardment and assault by superior numbers, were driven from the dominion—and all their lands were given to JAMES, Duke of York, the King's brother; and their liberties were decreased, and their New-Amsterdam was baptized New-York, and their Orange called Albany. To all this "the Dutch colonists submitted with characteristic good faith," until nine years after, when the French and English being at war, and New-York but poorly prepared for defence, the Hollanders, in their turn, pounced down upon the prize, pounced a broadside into the fort, killing and wounding a few men, and landing an overwhelming army (of 1,600) some distance above the City—in the rear of where Trinity Church now stands—marched down to the assault, which was only averted by a prudent surrender.

Now New-York is re-baptized again, and becomes New-Orange—in honor of Prince WILLIAM III.—and Albany, Williamstadt; and the Dutch are wild with joy, and New-England is exasperated and begins to threaten, and arm and fit out vessels-of-war, but prudently abstains from more dangerous acts, as the Dutch fort soon bristles with a formidable number of cannon and is well garrisoned; and so all they make by their hostility is the watchful enmity of the Hollanders, who treat all Yankees as the Parisians in the late war treated all Germans.

But this patriotistical state of things for the blessed Batavians continued only four blissful months, and then peace being made with England and France giving monitions of hostility to Holland, friendship with the old enemy is sealed by the peaceable surrender of all that Dutch prowess had secured.

An amusing result of the conflict of authority under the English rule will serve to show how slowly the definite lines which are now established were drawn and recognized. To secure his revenue, the Duke's Governor had ordained that all vessels trading within his original territory should enter at the New-York Custom-house. But Sir GEORGE CARTERET, who governed New-Jersey, had counter claims, and needed revenue himself. This led to bickering, protests, appeals to the King, a threatened conflict, interviews and long arguments. Finally, the energetic ANDROS, the able and resolute Governor of New-York, ordered some soldiers to Elizabethtown, who broke open CARTERET'S house in the dead of night, "hailed" him out of bed, and brought him in his robe de nuit over to New-York! There, "ill and forlorn," he was given into the custody of the Sheriff on the charge of assuming unlawful jurisdiction, and "riotously presuming to exercise government over his Majesty's subjects," &c. At his trial the jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty." This did not please ANDROS, and "he sent them back, with new charges," and bringing in the same verdict again, he charged them once more, and sent them out a third time. There must have been a large Dutch element in that jury, for he did not prevail, and at last their verdict of acquittal was recorded.

This spirit of irregularity seems to have found its way even into ecclesiastical affairs. It being necessary to ordain a minister, the provincial Dutch clergymen formed themselves into a classis—"the first ever held in America"—under the "official direction" of ANDROS, who was an Episcopalian, and examined and ordained the candidate. The coopers of the City caught the infection, and defying established custom, made "a strike," and "signed an agreement" to charge certain prices for their labor, and that "if any should do it for less, he should be fined fifty shillings, for the use of the poor." This however was promptly put down by the stern and strong hand of the law, and the combination declared to be "infamous," and punished by fines and imprisonment. The decision is curiously sustained by the statutes of EDWARD VI. and CHARLES II., and by St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy and Titus.

New-York City at this time differed essentially, and in more particulars than extent and the character of its buildings from our New-York of the present day. WOLLEY, the Duke's Episcopalian chaplain, who had been residing in the City for two years, and goes home to England about this time, with a certificate of good conduct from ANDROS, declares it to be "a place of as sweet and agreeable air as ever I breathed in, and the inhabitants, both English and Dutch, very civil and courteous, to whose tables," he continues, with a sort of after-dinner confusion, "I was frequently invited, and always concluded with a generous bottle of Madeira."

A few years before this an important step had been taken. "A monthly mail to New-England" was established. The carrier was "sworne to fidelity," and had "an annuall sallery affixt on him." Each first Monday of the month he sets out from New-York, and is to return within the month from Boston to us again." "By-letters were kept in an open bag, to dispense by the way," and able woodmen were to be requested "to make out the best and most facile way—which in process of tyme, would be the King's best highway."

The early history of New-York involves of necessity many conflicts, and negotiations and treaties with the Indians, and not a little of the interest of this volume is derived from narrations of events in connection with these—especially after the breaking out of "The French and English War." Our interest in the progress of the work is frequently, indeed, carried beyond the limits of the State, not merely because of the interweaving of its affairs with those of its neighbors, but from the natural following up of the enterprises which started from its territory, and which more or less affected its development. The explorations by the courageous and persistent Jesuits, and particularly those by LA SALLE, if not strictly within the avowed object of the volume, add to its attractiveness, and carry us back more perfectly into the state of the whole country at the time of which the author writes.

The contemporary history of the mother country comes more legitimately into view, and is given succinctly and with a constant regard to its influence on her colonies. Some of the most interesting pages of the volume are those which relate the bloodless revolution of 1688-9, by which JAMES II. and the hopes of the Roman Catholics were driven out of England, and WILLIAM and MARY were seated on the throne.

It was in consequence of an attempt on the part of JAMES to consolidate New-England, New-York and the Jerseys, that Massachusetts was moved to become "the first secessionist." The plan, in some respects, was flattering to the pride of the Puritans; for New-York was to be absorbed, her great seal broken, and the new dominion—including all the British possessions in North America, north of latitude 40°, and extending indefinitely out into the vague vastness of the unexplored West, to the "South Sea"—was to be called New-England. But she was to lose her liberties. The resolute and able ANDROS, "fond of prelacy," a prompt, and "uncompromising executor of the royal commands," whatever they might be—was appointed the Viceroy. The Assembly was abolished; and all power to make and abrogate laws, and appoint judges, was put into the hands of the soldierly, obedient Governor-General and his dependent council,—"no press was to be used, nor book printed, without the Governor's license;"—and behind all this was the active, watchful, determined bigotry of JAMES, whose "chief object was to establish"—in England and her dependencies—"the Roman Catholic religion in place of the Protestant."

While the people of New-York, therefore, "especially those of Batavian origin," disliked annexation to New-England, and felt themselves in "an unmerited state of degradation" when thus forced into the arms of their old rival and antagonist, New-England, was none the less repugnant to the union. "ANDROS' duty was to execute his Sovereign's commands," and this he did "with characteristic energy, faithfully, fearlessly, and sometimes harshly." In doing which he greatly offended the perverse people with whom he had to deal, and who had been so long "accustomed to order everything in their own way." They frowned upon his "surplliced clergymen" reading "the beautiful liturgy" which they believed to be the precursor of all the detested rites of the Roman Catholic Church. Petitions for relief "from the imperious administration of ANDROS" were sent over to JAMES, in the care of the learned INCREASE MATHER. But the King, with his eyes undiverted from his ulterior object, as he subsequently informs Pope INNOCENT, while receiving him graciously, baffled him with vague promises, which meant but little, and came to less.

The monarch, however, was blinded by his bigotry, and did not measure the forces with which he was contending, so one day he found himself without a throne; and his Viceroy ANDROS not long after, in the disorders and uncertainties that followed, found himself without his new dominion, and snugly ensconced in a Boston prison. This latter act awakens our author's ire. "A more unjustifiable rebellion never happened." Massachusetts, "with the headstrong audacity which always marked her pretensions, set herself up as superior to other English colonies of America, and demanded privileges greater than those of her colonials." By her "secession a loyal, but perhaps reluctant union was dissolved, and the most pretentious English colony became the first practical exponent of that doctrine of 'State rights' which afterward produced so much national disorder;" and "the selfish lust of oligarchy was more apparent in this meeting than devotion to the genuine principles of civil liberty." These severe censures are based upon the fact that a general order from WILLIAM and MARY had continued and confirmed in office in the colonies, for the time being, all "who were not Papists." It was a politic act, intended to make an easier transition. But this order was held back by the naughty Puritans, distrusting and disliking ANDROS; and, though "the whole affair was very mean," the spirit of defection spread, and ere long the old boundaries and separate Governments were restored; and New-York, when the turmoil was over, and the troubled waters had grown quiet and clear again, was at heart not less satisfied with the result of the disloyal and irregular action than was her unprincipled and rebellious neighbor.

FINE ARTS.

New Pictures, Statues and Busts—Notes.

Two fine examples of the two most distinguished artists of the realistic school of French painters—JULES BRETON and GUSTAVE BRION—have been on exhibition at the Goupil Gallery during the week. BRETON'S picture represents a group of peasant women of Brittany, working linen among the rocks on the sea coast. The two central figures, a woman and a girl, are nobly and gracefully drawn. Around them are half a dozen other figures in every variety of attitude. That this is a study from life, and a most conscientious one too, we cannot doubt. The artist has not attempted to idealize the scene. He has given us the peasant woman of Brittany as she is, with her brawny arms, huge hands and feet, and not too handsome countenance. The color is rather cold, but the composition, as a whole, is most striking. The picture is the property, we believe, of Gov. MORGAN.

From BRION we have "Un Enterrement en Venise." Four ecclesiastical officials, in scarlet rubea and copa, are seated in a gondola, which is gliding between the lofty and sombre walls of the once proud city. Near the prow of the gondola is a coffin, covered with a scarlet velvet pall. Each priest holds a bundle of long wax tapers, which are flaring with a lurid light in the open day. The countenances of the four figures are finely contrasted. One man is so old, so feeble, and so cadaverous, that we feel sure it will not be long before he too is borne to his last resting-place. Beside him sits a plump and jolly-looking fellow, whose thoughts are evidently not much occupied by his solemn duties. Near him is a handsome smiling youth, with long curling hair, who is confounded by a stalwart figure, seated much at his ease. All look as if they were performing an every-day duty, to which custom has rendered them utterly indifferent. Above is one of the many small bridges spanning the canals of Venice, from which a few loungers look curiously down on the dark gondola and its red-cloaked occupants. The picture is strongly painted, with striking contrasts of color, and light and shade. The expressions are well brought out, and the architectural surroundings truthful in form and color. Like BRETON'S picture, noticed above, it is, doubtless, a most faithful rendering of a scene common enough in Venice.

A very sweet and truthful landscape by KNELLER, "The Harts Mountains," is also on exhibition here. In color, crisp and careful delineation of foliage and general treatment, we have seen no landscape recently that excels this. There is a charm in the whole somewhat to the scene itself, but more perhaps to the perfect harmony of every part, that renders it more than ordinarily noticeable.

BEISCHLAG, a Hungarian, who cast aside the pencil and saw to take up the pencil, is represented by a genre picture. It is early dawn. A young workman has just risen from his pallet at early dawn, and is gaping and stretching himself as if the bonds of sleep still had a strong hold on him. The attitude, expression and coloring of this figure are admirable, and few, we think, can sit down before it for five minutes without feeling the truth of the old saying that "gaping is catching."

From M. A. KOEKKOEK we notice a landscape of merit, with a fine effect of perspective, and from MCENTEE one of his favorite and well painted Autumn scenes among the woods. Mr. SAMUEL COLEMAN has two pictures of very unequal merit—a marine view, untruthful in color, and a Californian mountain scene.

NOTES.

The Academy of Design reopened on Monday last. A large collection of pictures, donated by Mr. SUYDAM, are on exhibition, during the daytime only.

The Shakespeare Statue, by J. Q. A. WARD, will be unveiled in Central Park on Saturday, July 1. The location chosen for it is on the left-hand side of the Mall, near the marble arch.

A colossal bust of WASHINGTON IRVING, by MCDONALD, has been presented to the Brooklyn Park. Its merits, as a work of art, are not of a high order.

Consenting to Defraud.

On the 15th of April last the Home Life Insurance Company obtained judgment against the Empire Fire Extinguishing Company for $600, alleged to be due them for rent, and two days subsequently application was made, before Judge GILBERT, of Brooklyn, to have the Empire Company declared insolvent, and a receiver appointed. Papers were served on CHAS. H. WATERMAN, Secretary of the Empire Company, for the trustees to appear and show cause why such an application should not be granted. WATERMAN concealed the service of the papers, and in company with MONTAGUE R. LEVERSON, an attorney, secured the services of a lawyer named W. KINDALL HALL, and pretending to represent the Empire Company, went before Judge GILBERT and had themselves appointed receivers, but failed to file the necessary bonds. The trustees of the Empire Company finding this out, made application to Judge BARNARD, of the Supreme Court, to restrain WATERMAN and LEVERSON from acting as receivers. The motion was argued on Monday and decision reserved.

Mr. C. C. EGAN, attorney and trustee of the Empire Company, then made application before Judge INGRAHAM to have a receiver appointed. The application was granted, and THOMAS LANGDON, Deputy Clerk of the Superior Court, was appointed receiver. Yesterday CHARLES H. WHELAN, President of the Empire Company, had WATERMAN arrested on a charge of conspiring to defraud. He was taken to the Yorkville Police Court, and was held in $2,000 for examination by Justice COULTER.

An Operation in Checks.

MORTIMER O'CONNELL, a car-driver, formerly a merchant, was arraigned before Justice HOGAN, yesterday, on a charge of passing a worthless check on ANTHONY MAHRENHOLZ, of No. 809 Broadway. The complainant stated that on the 17th of September last, the prisoner having purchased of him a pair of shoes worth $11, tendered him in payment a check for $25 on the Pacific National Bank, drawn by ADELE O'CONNELL to his order. The check being subsequently presented at the bank, was found to be worthless. The prisoner is a native of Scotland, twenty-three years of age, and admitted his guilt. He said he had been at one time extensively engaged in the glass business in Cross-by-street, but having been burned out, had recourse to criminal practices as a means of subsistence. He was committed for trial in default of $1,000 bail.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The pious but money-seeking people of Providence, R. I., have a pleasant way of mingling moral discussions with business enterprise. We do not presume to say that they try to serve two masters, or that thoughts of mammon mingle in their devotions, but they have an ingenious way of arguing and deciding great moral problems. A question which lately agitated that community was whether a man could be a good Christian and sell cotton short. A prominent newspaper took hold of the matter and settled it in the affirmative, for, it says, if the man is unlucky he has sufficient punishment in the saving sorrow and affliction, which is health to the Christian soul; if he is lucky, he is so much the better able to do good to his fellow-creatures, and perform the most important of Christian duties.

What constitutes wit and humor is a great metaphysical question, on which profound philosophers have displayed a vast deal of thought. A thousand and one clever writers have tried to dissect a joke and tell what its proper ingredients should be, and have found it a difficult matter. But Lord MARCUS BERESFORD and two other specimens of the British aristocracy lately gave an illustration of what a joke consists of, which was worth a score of definitions. These vivacious gentlemen, having enlivened their wits by a "too liberal" dinner, achieved the exquisite joke, as they called it, of stealing a fine marble sun-dial and carrying it off in a cab. A prosy, unappreciative policeman couldn't get the humor of the thing into his muddy brain, and so arrested the two wits, and they were taken before a Magistrate, who told them they had not acted like gentlemen. Very likely, but they did not act up for gentlemen. They were wits, and there could be no doubt of the justice of their claim to that title. It is a terribly funny thing to carry off from some gentleman's grounds a piece of property that he values, an exquisite joke to daub a fine painting with coarse red paint, and the very height of jollity to cut down a man's fruit-trees or carry off his garden-gate.

The interests of pisciculture have received an unexpected check in the neighborhood of Burlington, VT., owing to the energetic fishing achievements of a large and vigorous seal which recently made his appearance in those waters. The shad disappeared so rapidly from the streams that the fishermen were in despair and began to think that the fate of their business had been utterly sealed. But a vigorous campaign was inaugurated and the intruder finally captured, and there is now hope that the shad will return to their haunts and the fishermen have no more such competitors in their business. How the animal ever got within the limits of the Green Mountain State is a nine days' wonder. He must either have come overland from the North Pole or have been lost by some straggling menagerie.

A German philosopher has lately been engaged in a pleasing study of the peculiarities of cannibals, the "anthropophagi that do each other eat." He has ascertained that there are at present upward of 2,000,000 of the population of the earth who have a depraved appetite for human flesh, make no scruples of butchering a missionary, and would roast the prettiest baby in Christendom for breakfast without compunction. It is gratifying to learn that the habits of these people are gradually diminishing their numbers. Of course there are not enough foreigners who venture within their reach to keep the market supplied, and they are forced to devour each other. In this process the more respectable people of the earth have reason to rejoice, for their insatiate appetite must in time materially reduce the population, which will go on decreasing till but one man remains in cannibal lands, and he will wander about seeking whom he may devour, and, finding no one, will starve to death. The following is the latest census of this interesting class of our fellow-beings: The Battas, 200,000 souls; the cannibals of the Niger Delta, 100,000; the Fans, 80,000; the cave-dwellers of the Bassuto country, 10,000; the Niam-Niam, about 200,000; the Mirambas and Monuyas, 2,000; the other South American cannibals, 1,000; the Australian aborigines, 80,000; the Melanesians, (without including New-Guinea,) 1,000,000. This calculation gives a total as the present time of 1,048,000 human beings addicted to anthropophagy, a number which actually represents the 600th part of the whole population of our planet, or fourteen hundredths per cent.

Why is it that we hear so much about the age of miracles being past, when every few days accounts reach us of events as wonderful as any recorded in the olden time? The fact is we are a faithless and unbelieving generation, and refuse to acknowledge the miracles that are performed in our own day. Now, we are told, there is a German blacksmith at Hickman, Ky., who performs the most remarkable cures without using medicine, or even touching his patients. Diseases seem to be entirely subject to the commands of this remarkable blacksmith, for by a word he orders off rheumatism, sores, headaches and a score of other "natural shocks that flesh is heir to," and unlike the spirits that Glendower could call from the vasty deep, they obey his word and go. The most remarkable thing of all is that this divinely-gifted man keeps hammering away at his anvil and cures everybody that comes to him without money and without price, as unconscious as any one else of the source of his miraculous powers. We would most respectfully advise the people of Hickman to inform the marines of this.

A town now a days is decidedly behind the times unless it has at least one ghost among its inhabitants. These inviable citizens are not very useful, as they neither pay taxes nor perform any of the duties of freemen. In fact, they are rather obnoxious than otherwise, being much given to disorderly conduct, and frightening more substantial folk out of their wits. Not to be behind other enterprising villages, however, Newark, N. J., has secured a first-class ghost as tenant in common with a respectable family in a house on Bloomingdale-avenue. There seems to be a whole troop of celestial visitants, in fact, which the leading spirit marshals up and down stairs in single file, slamming doors, penetrating into closets and making mischief generally. The other occupants of the house sit in amazement as the "footfalls tinkle on the tufted floor" and thump along the stairways. Of course there is an explanation of these visitations. The family occupying the haunted house had "one fair daughter" who married a Turkish merchant against the wishes of her parents. She departed for the East, promising to return sometime, if possible. The supposition is that she is dead, and finding it disagreeable with her early notions of propriety to dwell in the abode of departed Muselmwomen, now "revisits the pale glimpses of the moon" and leads a troop of ghosts up and down stairs in her father's mansion as a punishment for her way wardness in marrying an infidel Turk.

While the identity of the rightful holder of the title of Tichborne engages the sagacity of one of the highest tribunals of England, and is in a fair way of nonplussing the whole Bench and Bar of London, another important case of disputed personal identity has arisen in Ireland. Two ladies, living near Dublin, had each a gray parrot with a red tail. Greatly to the relief of the neighbors, no doubt, both ladies lost their precious birds at about the same time. One gray parrot with a red tail was discovered in the neighborhood, and of course both of the bereaved spinsters claimed it as her own. Miss PLUNKETT somehow got possession, but Miss FARELLY declared, with the shrillness of desperation, that Poll belonged to her. To prove her claim and enforce her right she brought suit for the recovery of her property. The Court was not equal to the task of deciding whether the bird produced, which was gray and had a red tail, was the one lost by PLUNKETT, or that for which FARELLY mourned, and so the case was dismissed. It was taken to a higher Court with the same result—the tribunal could not decide on the identity of one poor parrot. The bird himself should have been cross-examined. A keen lawyer ought to have been able to ascertain from him which household he had been connected with, though no title or great estate was at stake in the case.

The natives of India, in their progress toward civilization, seem to have just reached the witch-burning stage. Strange stories are told of their superstitious fancies regarding aged old women. One aged beldame was lately accused of eating the livers of the patients in a hospital, and in order to put an end to her indulgence in that objectionable kind of diet, the high-minded natives hung her by the heels to the branch of a tree, and swung her back and forth for several hours. In another case an alleged witch was on the point of being burned, when the English authorities rescued her. Her offence, too, was feeding on other people's livers, to the great prejudice of their health. These Hindoos ought to be either more or less civilized than they now are, for the present state of their progress is the worst imaginable.

SPIRIT OF THE RELIGIOUS PRESS.

The Independent contains an article by F. B. SANBORN on an ideal system of reformatories for young delinquents. After giving the leading features of the system, somewhat in detail, the writer sums them up briefly as follows:

"In brief, therefore, an ideal system, such as has been described, would begin with enforcing compulsory education of all children; and proceed, on that theory, to place the neglected and delinquent in truant schools, in private and local reformatories, and, by means of visiting agents, in well-selected families, even if it were necessary to pay their board in such families. By means of the same agency, the committments of juvenile and adult reformatories should be sifted and kept down, and the people sent forth as soon as possible into good homes. All children so placed out should be frequently visited, and, if girls, the visitors should be women. In the larger reformatories the segregate and the so-called family systems should be combined, though in different proportions, according to different needs. Finally, for such as proved incorrigible in reformatories, prisons should be provided, conducted on the Irish convict system, and with abundant apparatus for the employment and instruction of the prisoners. And no large State, it seems to me, has done its whole duty in this matter which in its jurisdiction until it has put in operation something resembling what I have attempted to describe."

THE GOLDEN AGE.

LYDIA MARIA CHILD discourses through the columns of the Golden Age on the peculiarities of different religions, no one of which, she thinks, can claim for itself all the good points. The following are her closing words:

"It is because the different religions do not understand each other that they have been so hostile. For centuries they have kept the sects apart, each thinking that Divine truth was exclusively intrusted to its keeping. Now, the Providence of God is bringing them more and more into contact with each other, and the process is mutually softening their prejudices. Among all nations can now be found some large souls who acknowledge that the Father of human family, though traveling by different roads, are all seeking the same Father's house. The idea that the whole world will ever be converted to Christianity is as fallacious as was the Jewish belief that God would exterminate everybody but Jews, in order that His 'chosen people' might have the earth all to themselves, to enjoy the good things of the millennium. But though Christianity is not destined to swallow up all other forms of religion, it will greatly modify them all, and will, in its turn, be modified by the knowledge it acquires in the process. But this is only one way in which Christians should not do all in their power to perfect the form and diffuse the principles of their religion; for these are necessary parts of the process by which the world will be renovated, and the highest truth attained."

THE CHRISTIAN UNION.

In speaking of the recent Papal jubilee, the Christian Union says that it is a celebration of the falsification of one of the traditions of the Catholic Church, but remarks nevertheless:

"There is one aspect of this august event, hailed as it is by the acclamations of millions of adherents to the Church of Rome, which elicits our sympathy and admiration. There is certainly something sublime, something touching in the sight of the faithful devotion of so many people to their chief, in the time of his troubles. Pope PIUS is a beautiful old man; in the main, we believe, a good one. It is not true, indeed, as has been confidently asserted, that his bitterest enemies have never cast a doubt on the perfect purity of his life. Nevertheless, whatever view may be taken of the claims of PIUS or of the wisdom of the measures of his reign, no one can deny the importance of that career, or the magnitude of the measures and the events which it includes. He has passed through two external revolutions, besides one in the sympathies and purposes of his own soul, which transformed him from a Liberal Pope, encouraging the cause of human progress, and rendering unanimity some of the very virtues that elevated him to his throne. Twice has it been his privilege to define new articles of the Roman Catholic faith, each time making good his grounds against the most able and determined opposition. Four times has he called around him the Roman bishops of the earth, once in an Ecumenical Council, whose magnitude and dignity, as well as the momentousness of its decrees, will make it a perpetual landmark in the realm of religious thought. It is natural, then, and proper in Rome, the scene of the exult of the great anniversary in the life of their Head, and as fellow-mortals having a good time, they are welcome to our sympathy. Let them make the most of their jubilee, for there are mutterings in the horizon. The ecclesiastical court that sets itself against the freedom of consciences, and lays the earthly penalty of fire and sword, is doomed of God and man; and whatever may become of the Catholic Church, the Papacy is doomed."

THE CHRISTIAN AT WORK.

Has public virtue perished? asks the Christian at Work, and, by way of answering the question, says:

"Weak road nature and strong selfishness have learned to strike hands in the abuse of power. Position and influence are looked upon less as a serious responsibility than as a means of conferring favors by which other favors may be bought. Appointments to office and recommendations to places of honor or profit are made a 'valuable personage,' both by the politician and the man of business. One is tempted to ask, Where does duty come in? Is there no such thing as fulfilling a trust without respect of persons? We sadly need to study the meaning of that phrase, which now means to be good for the public good, private ends, the aggrandizement of those who belong to our 'Ring' in the State and in the Church, have too generally displaced that spirit which is the foundation of Christian society, the spirit of unselfish devotion to the interests of all."

THE FREE METHODIST.

The Free Methodist makes an attack on what it designates as Church Gambling. Church festivals and fairs, it says, are conducted on the same principle as are lotteries and gambling-houses. The following are some of its remarks:

"Such enterprises succeed because many have the dishonest desire to obtain a valuable thing without paying for it. Now, we boldly say that church fairs strengthen and sanction such dishonesty. For instance, a church says, 'We will bet a $10 cake against 50 cents that you cannot guess right how many dishes of tea we take.' This awakens a dishonest desire in the spectator to obtain the cake without paying any just equivalent for it, and the Church parties evince a dishonest desire to get from as many as they can all the fifty cents they can. The man who bets twenty-five cents against fifty on certain cards in a pack, can see no difference between this and betting twenty-five cents on a gold ring in the certain pieces of a church cake, and there is no moral difference. The most common way of defending these ways of getting money is by saying that 'it is for the church, and the end sanctifies the means.' To do in a church what they do in a lottery looks worse instead of better. The glaring object for which the money is obtained cannot impart any sanctity to means so vile in their origination and associations. They are bad, and the church cannot make them good. We are not to do the least evil, even if we can obtain the greatest good by so doing. Righteousness must not be sacrificed to policy, and absolutely demanding interests. Get money in a sensible, sober, Christian manner, or go without it, and throw the responsibility upon God for the support of his cause, after you have done the best you can. Let the merits of the cause be the only appeal, and not an appeal to the love of pleasure and gain, so strong in poor fallen man."

THE CHURCHMAN.

The Churchman discusses the duties of the Church and its well-to-do members to the "oppressive" class in the community. It says:

"We hold that the Church must care for the right maintenance of the family institution. No State interference will reach the needed results. The business of the Church is to see that the households of the wealthy and the educated are first examples and then teachers for the households of the poor. The lesson of these is best teaching and example. This teaching can only be given by personal influence—and this influence can be got only in that bond of union which the Church may supply. It will not do for a rich lady to walk into a mechanic's household and advise and criticise, unless something gives that right. But if a young lady who teaches in a Sunday-school will take pains to see that her little scholars are taught needle-work; if she mind them to be careful of their dress, their personal neatness, their manners and habits; if she once gets an influence over them so that they look up to her, she can teach them much else which they will be the better for. Sponsorship gives rights capable of almost indefinite extent. Young men who desire to serve the Church as laymen can, if they will, teach a class of boys some useful branch of instruction, and gain a controlling influence over their whole lives. There are many churchmen who ask for Church work. Let them seek it, not in promoting causes, not in laboring for objects, but in caring for individuals. The secret of the best successes is found in the influence of man upon man, of woman upon woman."

THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN.

The Liberal Christian has a somewhat striking article on the "Decay of Theology." It thinks that zeal in theological questions and a taste for their study are dying out, and deplores the tendency in the following strain:

"The decay of theology, in short, is the decay of serious and earnest thinking, the gradual disappearance of faith, the loss of learning, the ignoring of the deeper questions of spiritual life. It is to be followed, if not withstood very soon with all the power, by the return, first, of mere materialism, then of pantheism, and then of atheism, by the triumph of sensual and selfish life, by the loss of vision which ends in the obliteration of moral distinctions and by general selfishness and worldliness. This is the natural history of what has again and again appeared as a tendency to decay in spiritual power in religion. It is another name for the purely superficial. It soon makes religion a mere verneering. This is not what the vestments of the taking delusion which proclaims Christianity a life and not a faith and a doctrine, are expecting or wishing. They will not believe a word of this warning. But it is not the less a necessary one, and proceeds from more reflection than they have given to the subject. Unless the interest in Christian theology is revived, unless equations are more respected, unless faith is more cultivated and understood, unless God is more known and worshipped and felt, unless sin is more dreaded, unless man's moral position is regarded with more concern, unless Christ's work is more profoundly studied and understood—not only liberal Christianity, but orthodox Christianity, will soon be in ruins, and the gospel have to begin its work anew in a demoralized and atheistic world."

THE JEWISH MESSENGER.

In speaking of the lack of representative men among the Israelites of this country, the Jewish Messenger says:

"Now, let it not be denied that we have in this land quite a number of wealthy Israelites, 'good' men and true,' but we fail to see among them many who will interest themselves in the cause of Israel, in doing anything to elevate our people in the esteem of our neighbors. It appears to us that all their energies are directed to the one single duty of wealth, one course to which we could not object, if we found that we observed their names in any of the public documents for the amelioration of society. We behold their readiness as subscribe, but we find no Jewish names among the active members. It cannot be for want of solicitation, for it must be a matter of fact that they would rather give their money than their time. All this is wrong. We have every reason to take an active part in all that tends to the interest of humanity, not narrowed down to the wants of Israel, but for the whole human family. We are led these remarks, influenced by our experience in public life. In every cause has appealed to our citizens, there has seldom appeared any Jewish name in the "call;" and sure we are that this arises from the unwillingness of our leading men to take a personal interest in public matters among all nations can now be found some large souls who acknowledge that the Father of human family, though traveling by different roads, are all seeking the same Father's house. The idea that the whole world will ever be converted to Christianity is as fallacious as was the Jewish belief that God would exterminate everybody but Jews, in order that His 'chosen people' might have the earth all to themselves, to enjoy the good things of the millennium. But though Christianity is not destined to swallow up all other forms of religion, it will greatly modify them all, and will, in its turn, be modified by the knowledge it acquires in the process. The ecclesiastical court that sets itself against the freedom of consciences, and lays the earthly penalty of fire and sword, is doomed of God and man; and whatever may become of the Catholic Church, the Papacy is doomed."

THE CHRISTIAN AT WORK.

Has public virtue perished? asks the Christian at Work, and, by way of answering the question, says:

"Weak road nature and strong selfishness have learned to strike hands in the abuse of power. Position and influence are looked upon less as a serious responsibility than as a means of conferring favors by which other favors may be bought. Appointments to office and recommendations to places of honor or profit are made a 'valuable personage,' both by the politician and the man of business. One is tempted to ask, Where does duty come in? Is there no such thing as fulfilling a trust without respect of persons? We sadly need to study the meaning of that phrase, which now means to be good for the public good, private ends, the aggrandizement of those who belong to our 'Ring' in the State and in the Church, have too generally displaced that spirit which is the foundation of Christian society, the spirit of unselfish devotion to the interests of all."

THE FREE METHODIST.

The Free Methodist makes an attack on what it designates as Church Gambling. Church festivals and fairs, it says, are conducted on the same principle as are lotteries and gambling-houses. The following are some of its remarks:

"Such enterprises succeed because many have the dishonest desire to obtain a valuable thing without paying for it. Now, we boldly say that church fairs strengthen and sanction such dishonesty. For instance, a church says, 'We will bet a $10 cake against 50 cents that you cannot guess right how many dishes of tea we take.' This awakens a dishonest desire in the spectator to obtain the cake without paying any just equivalent for it, and the Church parties evince a dishonest desire to get from as many as they can all the fifty cents they can. The man who bets twenty-five cents against fifty on certain cards in a pack, can see no difference between this and betting twenty-five cents on a gold ring in the certain pieces of a church cake, and there is no moral difference. The most common way of defending these ways of getting money is by saying that 'it is for the church, and the end sanctifies the means.' To do in a church what they do in a lottery looks worse instead of better. The glaring object for which the money is obtained cannot impart any sanctity to means so vile in their origination and associations. They are bad, and the church cannot make them good. We are not to do the least evil, even if we can obtain the greatest good by so doing

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

There is said to be a vast deal of destitution and suffering in Paris, 240,000 people being dependent on charity. The opinion is expressed that the famous Ecole Polytechnique will be suppressed, and St. Cyr be converted into a military school, from which foreigners will be excluded. M. PASCAL DUPRAT announces his adherence to the Government. Baron HAUSSMANN promises to accept the deputation of the country. GAMBETTA will not be a candidate for the Assembly, because he regards it as an illegal body. The trial of ASSY, ROCHEFORT and ROUCHEBOIS has been postponed again, on account of the elections. Gen. BOURBAKI has entirely recovered, and is in command at Lyons. M. RENAN has taken up his residence at Venice. There is to be a funeral service to-morrow in honor of the members of the Republican Guard assassinated by the Communists. Prisoners returning from Germany say that the people were friendly to them, but the authorities treated them harshly. Forty-seven ships of the French Navy have been disarmed, and 12,000 sailors dismissed from the service.

GENERAL.

The corner-stone of the new State Capitol at Albany was laid yesterday, despite the storm, which drenched all participating. As soon as the Grand Lodge was opened by M. W. JOHN H. ANTHON, Grand Master, HAMILTON HARRIS, Chairman of the Capitol Commissioners, made an address detailing the history of the erection of the building. Rev. Dr. HULLEY then made a prayer, and was followed by Gov. HOFFMAN in an address, in which he referred to the growth of the State as shown in the need for a building of such grand proportions as this. He closed by depositing in a cavity of the corner-stone a box containing various articles. Grand Master ANTHON then laid the corner-stone in accordance with the ritual of the Masonic Order.

Later advices from the West and California narrate the details of recent Indian outrages in Arizona and Texas. One man was tortured to death by fire, and the other butchered. A body of Government troops report having killed forty-three Apaches and recovered a large quantity of stolen property.

The Salt Lake City Methodist Camp-meeting is said to have been a great success. The next meeting, under the auspices of the same Committee, will open at Round Lake, Saratoga County, on the Fourth of July, and promises to surpass the largest meeting ever held in the United States. Every State in the Union will be represented. The mammoth tent, holding three thousand persons, will be brought from Salt Lake.

The decoration of the soldiers' graves in Mount Pleasant Cemetery, at Augusta, Me., took place yesterday. The city government, military and companies, Grand Army of the Republic, and citizens, generally, took part.

In the Superior Court at Northampton, Mass., yesterday, Judge PUTNAM sentenced E. H. BENJAMIN and C. M. DUNBAR, the Belchertown cattle thieves, on five indictments each, for burglary and larceny, to six years in the State Prison. Five Northampton liquor-dealers were given from two to five months.

The Democrats have nominated Judge ARGUELLE, of San Jose, to represent the San Francisco district in Congress, in place of Mr. ATHILL.

Hostilities have broken out among the rival tribes in the Feejee Islands, and cannibalism is being indulged in to an unlimited extent by the Levoni faction, who recently professed Christianity. King THAKAMBA is getting his forces ready to attack them.

The New-York State Editorial Association, which has been in session at Saratoga for three days, adjourned yesterday morning.

A terrific thunder-storm passed over Chicago on Friday evening. Rain fell in torrents for nearly an hour, accompanied by wind. Much damage was done to buildings in course of erection. Walls were blown down and trees prostrated. Basement stores and saloons were flooded. The losses will exceed $50,000. The tunnel under the river at Washington-street was inundated, the water pouring in at each end.

The Kansas wheat crops are represented as abundant throughout the State.

It is expected that the formal organization of the Board for the licensing of drug clerks will take place some time this week.

President GRANT and FRED. GRANT returned to Long Branch last evening, to their cottage, after having made a brief visit to Long Island.

Gov. HAIGHT, of California, and a committee of nine owners held a conference with the Amador strikers yesterday. The difficulty will probably be settled peaceably.

LAMMING HER, an inmate of the Auburn Prison, has fallen heir to $150,000. He was a resident of Ithica, where he married a lady in good standing. The criminal is known by the aliases of "Starnes" and "Lorcane C. Stewart." His term expires soon, when he will be tried on an indictment for robbery in Syracuse.

Prominent business men of this City and Brooklyn express the belief that from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 will be required for the building of the East River Bridge and its "approaches," or viaducts, together with the purchase of the avenues which will be required, the cost involved in destroying the buildings now standing, and the construction of the new and more massive ones.

The "Internationale."

Our readers may remember that we were among the first to note the true character of the Communistic outbreak in Paris, even before the European journals had fully discovered it. We said then, what is becoming clear now, that the struggle was a kind of picket skirmish, or outlying battle between the vanguards of the two great armies of labor and capital. Its terrible significance, even before a house was fired or a single desperate deed done by the Communists, was, to our mind, that it represented the deep explosive forces which underlie all modern society, and which threaten the well-being and safety of every city in Europe. It is very difficult for a journalist who knows the condition and feelings of the working classes throughout the world to make the readers of the comfortable classes understand how they regard their relations to capitalists and to society at large.

The conviction has settled down deep among the laboring classes in every civilized country, that the capitalists and employers, the rich and the comfortable, have taken advantage of their ignorance and weakness in past times, and have deprived them of their fair share of the goods of life. To their minds there has been a conspiracy among the rich, the learned and the religious, to defraud the laborer. He has been taught that political economy proved he could obtain no more of the "wage-fund;" that religion required him to be contented with that which he received, and the overpowering weight of capital has crushed him, if he has resisted. He has been told from the pulpit and the professor's chair, that the present law of competition was the only reasonable and divine law, and to it he must submit. After ages of this doctrine and this submission, the laboring class, during especially the past thirty and forty years, have risen up to say that they oppose and defy the present arrangement of society, and the laws of political economy as bearing on labor and capital. They will have none of your "wage-fund," they do not believe there is any fixed amount to the division between labor and capital; they denounce competition as the only law; they assert that it is they who are swelling, each year, the wealth of the world, while the employing class who contribute only direction, get all the good things of life. The laborer has toil, and poverty, and hardship; all Government is against him; the Church eats out his means by taxes, and strengthens his oppressors by hypocritical doctrines; if he resist, the rich combine and leave him to starvation and misery.

They propose to change all this; to do away with these institutions, such as the Church, the Aristocracy, and national Governments, which eat up the means of the laborers. They aim to bring about a fraternity of working men throughout the civilized world, who may be indifferent to what nationality the laborer may belong, and who will put an end to the wars of ambition and national jealousy. These will combine against capital, and, just as now, the trades-unions of Great Britain have their feet on the necks of many capitalists, and have succeeded in extorting from them higher wages, so, when these unions have become international, the working classes of all countries will hold capitalists at their mercy, and raise the rewards of labor throughout the civilized world. Then, if a trade should strike in Russia, and its movement be approved by the Central Board of Europe, every craftsman in that trade, from Archangel to London and San Francisco, would aid the strikers, and compel the employers to submit.

In every country, then, the highest point of wages would be obtained under which capital would remain in the business, and the working class would at length obtain their just and fair share of the blessings of life. But this is not all the aim of the Internationals. They strike for even higher game. They hope to rule the Government of various countries through universal suffrage, and pass such laws as shall establish labor on its just basis. Some only aim at legislation reducing hours of labor; others at the support of "co-operative banks" by the State; others, at the protection and aid of unions by Government; others, more ambitious, at the regulation of wages by the State. One great party, especially represented in Paris, have no less purpose than the entire reorganization of society. They propose to divide all property anew; to allot the division of profits by law; to place children under the care of the State; to make marriage a bond of feeling alone; to do away with the Church and Courts of justice, and to have a new world of their own, where competition shall not be the governor, and where fraternity and equality are the foundations.

Under the ordering of Providence, this party were temporarily permitted to realize their ideals. For a few months the world has been permitted to see a great capital governed by socialistic working men. We have had a specimen of "the world of the future," as the Internationals would have it, where the laborer's ideal has become fact. A more hideous spectacle, it may be safely said, has not been presented in modern times. A world without art, education or religion; where vulgarity and passion rule; where the vilest classes form the slums of a great city, control the treasures of art, literature and wealth in a world's capital; a world without God, without self-control, without other courage than that of the vermin prisoned in their dens, which, at last, perishes amid an awful conflagration of priceless structures of beauty, lighted from pure malignancy, and amid the murders of the pure and noble, who had devoted their lives to the good of the very classes that executed them. "If such be the civilization of the future, as the Internationals would have it," the world will say, "give us rather the barbarism of the past!"

Questions for Mayor Hall.

The great merit of the new City Charter, according to Mayor HALL, is that it reduces the responsibility for the proper administration of the Municipal Government to three or four persons, to whom the public are to look, and who are to be accountable for any mal-administration or fraud. This argument, in order to be of any force or validity, presupposes that these responsible officials will always be ready to rectify a wrong, when it is pointed out, and that they will be equally ready to explain, if it be susceptible of explanation, any transaction which appears upon its face to be fraudulent or suspicious. The alacrity which Mayor HALL has recently shown to point out a mistake (as he claims) which was made by a correspondent of the TIMES, relative to the administration of the District Attorney's office, encourages us to hope that he is willing to recognize and accept his share of responsibility; and we, therefore, take the liberty of putting to him two or three simple queries which he will much oblige the public by answering. They relate to the finance department of the City, the head of which, as is well known, never answers any questions or vouchsafes any explanations; but, as he received his appointment from the Mayor, we take it that the Mayor, so long as he retains him in office, is doubtless willing to take the responsibility of his acts.

The queries that we would like answered are as follows: First—By what authority were the $6,500,000 of "accumulated debt bonds" issued in 1869 and 1870, first issued? Was, or was not, the original issue made without any authority of law, and the illegal transaction afterward covered up by including the amount as a part of the City debt, for which legal bonds were issued? Second—What was the amount of liabilities against the City and County, audited by the Mayor, Controller, and President of the Board of Supervisors, between April 26, 1870, and April 30, 1871, and paid by the Controller by the issue of "revenue bonds?" And are these revenue bonds, which purport on their face to be payable out of the taxes for 1871, to be actually so paid, or are they to be added to the permanent "consolidated debt" of the City? By giving an explicit answer to these questions, or by requiring his financial secretary, RICHARD B. CONNOLLY, to furnish an answer, the Mayor will gratify a large number of tax-payers, and help to clear up matters that are left in the dark by the Controller's report.

Professional Nurses.

Every intelligent physician knows that what he can do toward rescuing a patient from the grasp of disease is but a part, and many of them frankly say, the least part, of the required labor. With the progress of the art of healing, physicians are more and more willing to abandon violent and extreme measures, and to confine themselves to removing, as far as possible, the obstructions to the recuperative forces of nature. Diet, pure air, cleanliness in person and in surroundings, the regulation of the exertion, and as far as may be, of the mental condition of the patient, are now considered as of at least equal importance with the administration of even the most skillfully prepared and carefully adapted medicines. It is plain that in this treatment of sickness, the share of the nurse is of extreme importance, and that to perform that share safely and efficiently, qualities not inferior in nature and hardly so in degree to those of the physician, can be thoroughly employed.

It is equally plain that in this country nurses thus qualified are very rarely found, and from professional life may be said to be wholly absent. No one who has had experience of the infliction looks on the advent of a "professed nurse" in the household without mingled dread and disgust. Ignorance, carelessness, insolence, indifference, and often intemperance are tolerated, because even with them the task that must be done is done better by the nurse than it could be done in any other way. Personal protest and supervision, of course, are tried, and the physician is appealed to, and does his best to control the evil, but his best often falls far short of a reform. Thus patients suffer, friends are wronged, and the physician himself is sadly hampered by the want of that aid for which comparatively no means of supply exist.

During our late war, this evil, though keenly felt at first, was obviated to some extent by the entrance of a large body of intelligent, earnest, disinterested women into the hospitals, whose kind hearts and ready hands were helped by minds of more than professional activity. Nothing was more remarkable in our remarkable struggle than the appearance in so short a time of so large a number of women capable of making, and who actually made, most useful nurses, such as our physicians would gladly welcome in our hospitals and in private service. In the late Franco-German war, it is well known that the French suffered severely from the want of this kind of material, and that such as was brought into requisition, was organized and directed largely by American surgeons and lady veterans of the Sanitary Commission. In Germany, on the contrary, there was found a body of educated nurses, in the members of the various Roman Catholic sisterhoods. The value and extent of the services rendered by these devoted women are acknowledged by a correspondent of the Nation—a surgeon who served six months in the Prussian military hospital, most of the time at Cassel, and who came into daily intercourse with them. He describes them as highly and practically instructed in their special duties—in the preparation of food for the sick, and, to a considerable extent, in materia medica; in the symptoms of danger to sick or wounded patients, and the simple means of immediate relief; in the preparation and use of bandages and dressings; in the use of cupping-glasses and leeches, the measuring of temperature and the giving of subcutaneous injections. This instruction was received under the direction of the Church authorities, and was thorough in degree, and received with admirable fidelity and devotion. It is unnecessary to say that we have nothing approaching it in this country. The best of the female nurses trained by hospital experience during the war, have returned to their ordinary avocations, and the medical profession is nearly as helpless now as it was ten years since. We can imagine the smile that would greet a suggestion to one of our hospital physicians to leave to an average nurse the record of changes of temperature in an inflammatory disease, or the application of subcutaneous injections in an acute case requiring such treatment.

There is, however, no reason why this want should not be met. It is certainly extensive enough, the pay to be secured by skillful nurses is high enough to make it impossible to account for the deficiency on the ordinary principles of supply and demand. It arises mainly, we imagine, from the absurd notion, deeply rooted in the American mind, that the occupation is menial. It certainly is not so in any conceivable interpretation of that vague and much-abused word. It consists in the rendering of services, such as it is the pride of every affectionate and faithful woman to render gladly, patiently and tenderly to those she loves, and which, when rendered in the course of a regular profession, need not, on that account, be the less nobly and honorably given. Sentiment apart, however, the work is neither too arduous to be learned by proper application, nor of a kind which the most delicate and fastidious need hesitate to undertake, for the relief and benefit of fellow beings and for the earning of an honest livelihood. We believe it to be in the power of the physicians to gradually effect a great and needed reform in this direction; they are at once most fitted to begin it and most sure to profit from its prosecution.

New Flying-Machines.

It is pretty safe to disbelieve that any man will ever fly in the air, until we see him do it. Accounts of new devices for this purpose usually begin with a candid recital of the grave difficulties to be surmounted, and a highly scientific statement of the ingenious discoveries and appliances by which those difficulties are to be overcome. Nothing is ever more plausible than the prospectus of a new flying-machine. From the time of Icarus to that of the San Francisco Aviator, the thing, according to sanguine expectation, has really been on the eve of being accomplished at last. The only trouble is that in the sequel the machines don't fly. They may be elaborate and beautiful pieces of mechanism, they may be provided with the most sagacious and far-sighted provisions for rising and falling, and going fast and going slow, but, like the Irishman's pig, they always travel the wrongway. They come down, that is to say, with great facility when started from a high place, but their ascent is quite another affair. Some tiny blunder, some unforeseen weakness, like that of the wax that fastened the wings of the aspiring Cretan, and which melted in the sun, vitiates the most profound calculations; and forthwith the new flying-machine is cast into the limbo of things despised and forgotten.

There is, then, abundant precedent for the supposition that the laws of gravity will always prove too much, in the aerial field, for the ambitious dexterity of man. Yet, if we adopt this opinion without reserve, we are quickly reminded of the ocean telegraph, of the vast speed of locomotives, and of other less conspicuous scientific triumphs which a few short years ago would have been thought as incredible as a successful flying-machine is now; and there is no doubt that such examples continue to spur men to toil patiently on, expending time, money, and their highest powers, in the hope of attaining what the world believes to be unattainable. No sooner does one flying-machine break down, or do anything else but "go up," than we straightway hear of another which is to profit by all the failures of its predecessors, and, like COLUMBUS' breaking of the egg, or his voyage to Cat Island, show that to be easy which was hitherto impossible. The Californian Aviator is heard of no more. Its descent in Central Park, forty-eight hours from Monte Diabolo, is no longer looked for. From a plausible expectation it has faded into a mythical romance, like the descent of Sinbad's roc in the Valley of Diamonds. Yet the Scientific American of this week tells us of not one only, but of two, new flying-machines, of which the respective inventors cherish exalted hopes. The first mentioned of these is illustrated by a kind of prophetic drawing, and is the invention of a citizen of Wilmington, Del. It presents what is, we believe, a novelty, and one that will appeal to, if it does not convince, practical mechanicians. This consists in the expedient of employing the strong muscles of the thighs to aid the arms in the movement of the wings. The common principle has been that of leaving the wings to be worked by the force of the arms only; and bringing in that of the thighs is to utilize for the purpose the greatest power the human body can exert. Whether this clever innovation will suffice to conquer all the mechanical obstructions to the end in view remains to be seen; but the result, we fear, is not far from a foregone conclusion. For, if the picture in the Scientific American is drawn to scale, as we may reasonably assume, the relative proportions of the engine and the human body are such as to render the former's supporting the latter in the air, quite apart from any propulsion, exceedingly improbable.

The second machine is said to be at the old Novelty Works in this City. It is constructed to be driven by steam. A vertical boiler of two-horse power is held in a frame at the bottom of the structure. At one side of the top is one of ROOT's rotary engines. On the shaft is a "miter gear" which meshes into two others, one at the top and another at the bottom of the gear on the engine shaft. The two driven gears are respectively keyed to a solid shaft and a hollow shaft, the former rising vertically through the latter. Hence, equal but reverse motion is gained in the two shafts. The shafts carry propeller screws made of light metallic framework, with blades of canvas stretched over skeleton frames of iron. All the machinery is elaborately braced and has the plausible look common to these undertakings. The trouble probably with this machine is that its weight exceeds the capacity of its propellers. The impediment is old and familiar, and is likely to continue insuperable until, in the language of the respectable authority we have quoted, a solution is found of the problem "in the discovery of materials of combined strength and lightness, yet unknown to science, and also in the invention of a motor having a power, in proportion to weight, comparable to that of the pectoral muscles of birds." In the absence of these two desiderata, however we may wish success for enterprising and devoted inventors, it is to be feared new flying-machines will share the fate of the Golden City Aviator, and Prospero's "insubstantial pageant," and that having attracted surprise and admiration for a space, they will vanish forever from our sight and "leave not a rack behind."

Summer Excursions.

The true philosophy of pleasure is too little understood in New-York. In the hurry and rush of business a large section of our community seem to forget that if one spends all his time in accumulating what is at best only the means of attaining certain pleasurable ends, he is letting his days go by without stopping to taste the enjoyments themselves. This hot Summer season is not a time for unremitting hard work or close application. Nature meant it as a sort of holiday season, and the denizens of our bustling metropolis would gain health and longer life if they would pause in their feverish haste, and take things more quietly for a time. It is not every one that can go off on an extended trip, but luckily those who cannot go off at all have at hand the means of recreation, if they choose to use them. The City and its surroundings have every natural advantage, and the appliances for enjoying holidays could very easily be supplied if the people showed a disposition to use them. Our German fellow-citizens are teaching us some good lessons in this respect. They do not, as a class, visit the fashionable watering-places very much, nor do they generally take long vacations from work or business, but they make the whole Summer season a sort of half-holiday time, taking their families out frequently for a day's pleasure in the parks and picnic grounds, or sailing in gaily-trimmed excursion boats on the beautiful waters that surround us.

This kind of relaxation is salutary, and should be encouraged. It is a delusion to suppose that the weeks of Summer cannot be enjoyed by those who remain in the City, but must necessarily be a weary, listless time, looked forward to with dread, and lived through with discomfort. There is no reason why Summer, even in our own busy metropolis, should not be a period of comparative ease, and for recuperation against the work and anxieties of the busier part of the year. The only thing lacking is a disposition on the part of the people to make it so. There are already many pleasure grounds in and about the City, pleasant sea-beaches lie within convenient distance, steamboats are built especially for excursions, and there would be many more if called for. In short, the material for Summer pleasures are ample, if we would but use them. Now, however, they are monopolized in a great measure by the lower and coarser elements of our population. There is no reason why Coney Island should be left to the roughs, or why the Patrick O'Flaherty Association and similar august bodies should be the only people who have picnics and excursions. Churches, Sunday-schools, day-schools, and private parties of respectable citizens should put in a larger demand than they do for a share of the pleasure-grounds and excursion-boats. They would then be put in better condition, and rambles and frolics would take the place of the insane dancing and guzzling which characterize many of the picnics of the day. For those who can go off into the country, or visit places of interest, it is well enough to do so; but the mass of our population need to have rational enjoyment at home and make Summer in some measure a season of rest and relaxation, instead of alternate excitement and listlessness.

The Ruth Poisoning Case.

It is announced that Dr. MEDLICOTT, the physician who stands accused of the murder of Mr. RUTH, at Lawrence, Kansas, is to be put upon trial for another and still more detestable crime. Our readers will remember that Dr. MEDLICOTT, who had been regarded as an admirer of Mrs. RUTH, was with her husband alone on the night before the morning of his death. RUTH left a note, in which he said he had taken a powder given him by MEDLICOTT, and analysis of his stomach betrayed the presence of poison. MEDLICOTT was therefore held for trial. But another complication is now added to the plot of this melancholy tragedy. Mrs. MEDLICOTT had died suddenly some time before, and there were not wanting people who regarded her sudden taking off with suspicion. Her husband's good professional standing, however, his unstained record before the world, and his high position in the Church of which he is a member, prevented the affair from undergoing close scrutiny. All these circumstances, in truth, may fairly weigh in presumption of his innocence until he is proved to be guilty. Yet it must be owned that late declarations of the local Press make the case look very dark for him. The Democratic Standard, a journal printed in Lawrence, the town where the poisoning occurred, affirms that the body of Mrs. MEDLICOTT has been exhumed, since the death of RUTH, and the stomach examined; that poisons have been found therein similar to those found in the stomach of RUTH; and that MEDLICOTT will be tried for the murder of his wife as well as for that of his patient and friend.

It is just to say, while quoting this positive and apparently damnatory statement, that some doubt exists as to the nature of the chemicals found in RUTH's stomach, and that the evidence, so far as we have seen it, that connects MEDLICOTT with the administration of the drugs, while highly suspicious is yet purely circumstantial. The sudden death of Mrs. MEDLICOTT may still prove to have been natural, and it is conceivable either that RUTH did not die of the drugs found in his stomach or that he administered them himself. Yet the two deaths, both sudden, both of persons whom, on an obvious theory, MEDLICOTT might wish out of the way, both of persons whom he attended as a physician, and both showing, on examination, common deleterious substances in the stomach, afford strong presumptive evidence against MEDLICOTT's innocence.

Again, as regards the incentive to the double crime, fresh testimony is forthcoming. This, be it remembered, is not yet sworn to in the witness-box, but it is vouched for by the local Press as emanating from a well-known and respectable citizen. This gentleman says that he had a conversation with RUTH, a few days before his death, in which RUTH made some very significant statements. He remarked:

"That the death of the BARON DE STRAHON, of Starasbourg, maternal grandfather of Mrs. RUTH, left the estates to a crippled or deformed sister, and upon her death, should she leave no issue, they would descend to Mrs. RUTH's mother, and through her to Mrs. RUTH. This sister never married, and since the commencement of the Franco-Prussian war, information has been received of her death. As Mrs. RUTH's mother proposed to relinquish all her claims in favor of Mrs. RUTH, it left her sole heiress to estates valued at several millions of dollars, and the right to assume the title of Baroness DE STRAHON. Mr. RUTH spoke of their intention to lay claim to the title and estates upon the settlement of the difficulties in France, and of his regret that his education and social advantages had not been such as to fit him for sustaining the dignity of a position he might be called to fill as the husband of a titled lady."

Now it has been repeatedly pointed out in MEDLICOTT's behalf that, considering Mrs. RUTH's seniority to himself, the fact that she had been three times married, and that it was not necessary to commit crime in order to enjoy her society, that motive was lacking to account for the poisonings. If, however, the above story is true, and it is said by the Kansas papers to be fully attested, the exculpatory plea decidedly loses in force. MEDLICOTT, in that case, could almost surely be privy to the facts, and the carefully-arranged absence of Mrs. RUTH at the time of her husband's death must appear almost as certainly a matter of collusion. From the developments hitherto made, the accused stands in a very hazardous position. It is right to bear in mind, notwithstanding, that MEDLICOTT's side of the story has not yet been judicially told, and that the public, as well as the law, may justly and mercifully hold the unfortunate man to be innocent until he is fairly proved to be guilty.

MINOR TOPICS.

We publish elsewhere a communication relating to the cost and carrying capacity of the proposed Viaduct Railroad, which we recommend to the perusal of those who are content to indorse even Ring management, for the sake of obtaining the much-needed means of communication between the upper and lower sections of the Island. Accepting the current estimate of the cost of this extravagantly-planned undertaking, our correspondent shows that to pay the interest of the stupendous sum demanded, one-fourth of our entire population would have to be moved every day at a fare of five cents a head. The physical impossibility of any such enormous traffic is tolerably apparent, and the obvious necessity of providing, in addition to this, for the working expenses and depreciation of the road, places the ruinous nature of the plan, as at present estimated, altogether beyond dispute. It must be remembered that the taxpayers of the City are called upon to face this appalling possibility when it has been clearly shown that private individuals could have furnished means of transit as ample and as expeditious as are now promised us, without a cent of expense to the community.

The Cincinnati Gazette indulges in some plain speaking at the expense of the jury who disagreed in the case of VALLANDIGHAM's client, the alleged murderer of MEYERS. It charges that the verdict was the result of partisan influence, as evidenced by the fact that of the seven Democrats on the jury none were for a verdict of murder. MCGEHAN's qualities as an assassin and bully were, it is stated, highly useful to the Democratic managers and to the Whisky Ring, while to both the dead man, MEYERS, was specially obnoxious. The surviving counsel of MCGEHAN worked on the susceptibilities of the jurors by the appeal that VALLANDIGHAM had sacrificed himself for his client. It is alleged, however, that the manner of the senior counsel's death showed the fallacy of the argument he wished to establish in the case of MCGEHAN, since, in "the nearest approach he could show to any possible position, VALLANDIGHAM's pistol shot downward, whereas MEYERS was shot nearly across the body."

Democrats who have been prematurely exultant over a Western defection from the ranks of the supporters of the Administration will, doubtless, agree to ignore the fact that the resolution in the Ohio platform which indorsed President GRANT passed both the Committee on Resolutions and the Convention by an unanimous vote, and that its general reception was of the most cordial character. The lesson might, not inaptly, be pondered by sundry Republican factionists not unknown to our readers.

The erection of a new town hall in Gloucester, Mass., leads Gen. BUTLER, by an eminently natural association of ideas, to speak of the deeds of the Paris Communists. The General is, obviously, rather behindhand in his newspaper reading, since he persists in saying that a struggle for municipal liberty describes the full significance of the outbreak in Paris. As our readers are tolerably well aware, and as an article given above more fully enunciates, this is but a very partial explanation of the latest revolt of the "Reds." A "Town Government" was only one of the elements in the programme of the Communists, and if the people of Gloucester have no better fountain in their water than Gen. BUTLER, they will be exceedingly apt to retain a mighty inconsistent and distorted view of one of the most significant events of modern history.

PIO NONO may take a lesson from the ingenious Catholics of Charleston, S. C. During the jubilee in that city on the 15th inst., just as Hon. M. P. O'CONNOR was apostrophizing "Faith, which binds us in pacific contented allegiance to the throne of Peter," a transparent picture of Faith, praying before a mighty cross was projected, by a big magic lantern on the walls of the ruined cathedral before the audience, who were deeply pleased by the novel dimensions of the familiar altar. Such an entertainment, skillfully managed before an Italian audience of average scientific culture, would be received as a first-class miracle, and would give sanctity to almost any demand the Pope might make immediately after either, for worship or pence. In this degenerate land it produced only a temporary astonishment and a very neat puff in the local journals for the peripatetic and probably heretic "Professor" who got it up.

A curious mania appears to have seized upon the people of Albany: they have all some crazy to drink water out of a hole in the corner-stone of the Capitol. The idea was first started, as we learn from the Albany papers, by an old lady who, while looking at the cavity in the stone made for the reception of documents and other mementoes, saw some rain-water in the bottom, and insisted upon having a drink of it. The old lady's freak proved to be the forerunner of a general rush of the people of Albany to the corner-stone—all anxious for a libation. The fountain was soon exhausted, but the accommodating superintendents of the building renewed it, with a plentiful admixture of ice, and it has since become the favorite pool from which the Albanians slake their thirst. The resident furnishes a good text for the temperance societies; and, by the by, why should they not turn out and assist in laying the corner-stone as well as the Masons? To be sure the new Capitol is not intended to be a monument to temperance; neither was it designed for a Masonic temple.

It is the misfortune of M. JULES FAVRE that the glory of a long, faithful and courageous legislative and forensic service against the tyranny of the Empire will be dimmed in history by the record of his absurd career as Minister of Foreign Affairs. He has just issued a circular to the diplomatic agents of France, endeavoring to explain the character and course of the recent insurrection. He describes in rhetoric that would be ridiculous from any but a Frenchman to Frenchmen, the distinctive principles of the Communists, their extensive organization and the fright which the knowledge of their character caused to paralyze the friends of order in Paris; he describes the necessity of arming and fortifying them during the German siege, and the arduous task of dislodging them after they had seized the city. But he does not, and probably does not, account for the fatal blunder of leaving arms in their hands rather than in those of the order-loving Mobiles. This was undoubtedly done because the Government felt that its claims to respect were more likely to be acknowledged by the National Guard than by an army recruited from the provinces, and when they discovered their mistake it cost a second siege and the burning of Paris to rectify it.

PEACHES FROM DELAWARE.

The Estimate of the Peninsula Fruit-Growers' Association—2,215,000 Baskets Promised.

From the Wilmington Commercial, June 22.

An interesting meeting of the Peninsula Fruit-Growers' Association was held in the State-house, at Dover, yesterday. JOHN P. COCHRAN, the President, presided. Mr. BROWN, Chairman of the Committee to wait upon the Governor and request him to call a special session of the Legislature, to restore the peach growers from the importation of insect larva, made a report, stating that on the 7th of June the Committee had an interview with the Governor, and his Excellency, after hearing them patiently, gave them to understand that he did not favor the petition, and that he would give his reasons in a letter more in detail after more mature consideration. The letter of Gov. FOUCHE was read. He says that the Constitution of the State only gave him the power to call a special session on extraordinary occasions. He does not consider the present case of that character, the course of the Railroad Company had been such as to deserve the severest denunciation, and the forbearance of the people was remarkable under the circumstances. Should he call an extraordinary session, only one of three things could be done, viz: Limit the rates of freight by a law to that charged by other roads, or repeal the laws passed by the Legislature, taxing the Company. The deliberations of a session called for that purpose would fail to give the relief asked for, and like other acts, would become subjects of litigation without any corresponding benefit.

"Was VALLANDIGHAM a Traitor?"

The Chicago Republican of Friday morning contains the following letter:

CHICAGO, JUNE 22, 1871.

To the Editor of the Republican:

In your issue of this morning, in an article entitled, "Was VALLANDIGHAM a Traitor," you repeat what you have previously asserted; that he was not. The South was in rebellion against the Government for independence. If VALLANDIGHAM sympathized with them in this desire, was he not as much of a traitor as JEFF. DAVIS? Below is a letter, over his own signature, in which he declared that he hoped and prayed for the success of the South in its struggle for freedom, and advised them to make the war more bloody still; and even recommends them to imitation of the Greeks. If this does not constitute a traitor, please define the meaning of that word. The following is the letter referred to. It was written to Col. ISBELL, of the Eighth Alabama Regiment, while VALLANDIGHAM was in the South:

You surmise correctly when you say that you believe me to be friendly to the South in her struggle for freedom. My leanings have been publicly expressed in my own country, in that assertion from Lord CHATHAM: "My Lords, you cannot conquer America." There is not a drop of Puritan blood in my veins. I have descended, as I deny the pretended Government which has cast me among you, for my opinion's sake, and shall never give it up or suppress it on account of your unrighteous cause. But for one consideration, I would be with you now. I am in the United States, North. Should you succeed in your struggle, you have no friends in the military who would speak out but for the military power that now stamps their every act.

Although the contest has been and will continue to be a bloody one, you have but to persist and you will be free. You will only be pressed, as our people have been, by the enormous taxes necessary to pay the debt incurred by conquering the country. The shortest road to peace is the promptest road. You can have your own terms by gaining the hearts of your enemy's soil.

Please convey my regards to your personal subordinates, and sincere thanks for your kind wishes in my behalf, and hoping and praying for the ultimate success in which you are fighting, believe me, yours truly, C. L. VALLANDIGHAM.

Col. D. D. ISBELL, Eighth Alabama, Volunteers.

AMUSEMENTS.

Mlle. Rosa Rand has left the Bateman Company, and will appear in Boston.

The revival of "Tangle a Butterfly" at the Fifth-avenue Theatre, under the new title of "Belmonde's," and the reproduction (as Wallack's) of "Two Roses," were the only noticeable incidents of last week. Both these pieces will keep the bills for some nights. At most of the other houses, last evening witnessed the final rehearsal of the same entertainments which have occupied attention for some time. To-morrow, therefore, some changes of programme will be made. At Niblo's "The Colleen Bawn" will be brought out. At the Olympic, Mr. and Mrs. HARRY WATKINS will commence an engagement, and will act at first in "Kathleen Mavourneen." At Wood's, "Humpty Dumpty" a new pantomime, will succeed "Three Blind Mice." The musical interest of the week centres in the concerts of the Saengerfest.

Mme. Gassia.

Mr. GUS. PHILLIPS, who has won a local reputation as a representative of the Germano-American citizen, as he is popularly understood to have his being, will see at the Trimble Opera-house, in Albany, on Sept. 4, in a new drama, written expressly for him, and entitled "Oofty Goof."....Mr. HENRY DRAYTON, whose talent as a musician and as actor we have often had occasion to extol, has completely recovered from his late illness. He performed last evening at the Grand Opera-house, in "The Bohemian Girl." It is understood that this was his last appearance as a singer, and that an early debut as an actor will be made by him. In yesterday's programme, Miss ROSA HERBERT was Arline, while the Gypsy Queen was portrayed by Miss FANNIE GOODWIN, whose very fine voice has gained much by study and an artist's experience....PIKE'S Opera Bouffe Troupe ended its sojourn, yesterday, in Cincinnati....The latest copy of the San Francisco Chronicle contains the announcement following: "SUSANNA W. DUNBAR leaves for New-York this morning, for the purpose of securing some leading vocal artist, either NILSSON or CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG, to take the principal part in a series of monster concerts, to be given some time in August, or at the time of President GRANT'S visit to this coast. They are to be given at Union Hall, (which will be frescoed and rejuvenated for the occasion, Mr. Dunbar manager the Camilla Urso concerts, which were the grandest musical (as well as financial) successes ever achieved on this coast, which is a sufficient guarantee of his ability to satisfactorily carry out the present enterprise. Mr. Dunbar informs us that he has the assurance of leading citizens of their hearty co-operation to make the concerts a financial success."....The Lingard Troupe appeared at the Salt Lake City Theatre on the 12th....It is reported that Miss AMY SEDGWICK, the distinguished English actress, encouraged by the success of Mlle. NILSSON and Miss. SHERIDAN, has decided to come to the United States next Fall. Miss ANNIE DYLAND sailed for Europe, under engagement to Mrs. JOHN WOOD, yesterday....Miss KELLOGG and Signor RANDOLFI are to sing in New-London on Wednesday evening....The English Opera Troupe sang in Montreal on Thursday, Friday and Saturday....Mr. DOMINICK MURRAY was at the Theatre Royal in Montreal....Mlle. MONTAGNE will dance in Baltimore on Aug. 15. She was at the Boston Museum last week....A neat monument has been recently erected in the Cemetery at Salt Lake City, to the memory of ANNIE LOCKHART WILSON, whose death at an early age was lamented by a large circle of warm friends and admirers. The tomb bears the following inscription: "Near this place rest the remains of ANNIE LOCKHART WILSON, (consedience), a native of Derby, England, who passed from earth-life at Salt Lake City, November 18, 1869, in the 24th year of her age. This stone is erected by HENRY and MINNIE EDWARDS, two friends, who loved her well, and who cherish her memory with an affection that can never fade."....Mr. EDWIN ADAMS' engagement at the California Theatre continued....Chicago theatricals are dependent on the labors of the Wyndham Comedy Company at the Dearborn, and Miss KATIE PUTNAM at Hooley's Opera-house....Mr. J. K. EMMET opened last week in Toledo.

Foreign Affairs.

M. CAPOUL'S success on the Italian lyric stage has been confirmed by a second performance of "Faust." The London Athenæum newspaper says: "The honors of the evening belonged to Mme. TERESELLI-BETTINI, who sang so superbly as to assure the encores for her two airs, and to M. CAPOUL, the new tenor. The French artist achieved his triumph in the cavatina, 'Salve! Dimora,' which the audience, having heard twice, wanted to have repeated a third time; and he has realized the prophecies of ADDEN,—that if M. CAPOUL took to the Italian stage, he would be one of its most distinguished tenors. The secret of his success will be found to lie in sensible singing, in which he yields to no artist in intensity of expression. He can attack the high G's and A's with ease, and has a falsetto at command, the quality of which is particularly sympathetic. In his declamatory passages he recalls the tones of DUPREZ. His power of sustaining a note is remarkable; he phrases well, and refrains from the vulgar display of vocalization. He has the faculty of diminishing the sound of a note to a whisper but audible piano tone. As an actor he is easy and graceful, and has power when necessary. M. CAPOUL must be criticised as a representative, at present, of the French School, from the vocal and histrionic points of view. His experience has been at the Opera Comique, and he reminds us of what M. ROGER was in his best days. There is nothing to prevent M. CAPOUL from being the successor of Signor MARIO. The French artist is decidedly the nearest approach to the Italian tenor. Young, handsome and successful, with a fine organ and refined method, M. CAPOUL has his future in his own hands. He has only to recollect the Rubini maxim, always to study and to practice, and he will be recognized as the leading tenor of the Italian theatre." The London Era of June 10 says: "The case of FULLER vs. FULLER was before the Divorce Court yesterday. The petitioner, who is well known in the theatrical world as Miss ROSA LECLERCQ, prayed for a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery and cruelty. Mrs. ROSA MARY ANN FULLER was married to Mr. FULLER at St. Mary's Church, Bryanston-square, and afterward her cousin resided with her. The respondent, prior to the marriage taking place, said he was a Captain, but it was subsequently ascertained that he was a horse-dealer and commercial traveller. Soon after the marriage her husband treated her with great cruelty and neglect. She had to continually ask him for money, and he always refused it, and when she knew he had some, and told him so, the respondent said that he had other uses for it. The cruelty was continued in January, 1869, and had it not been for the kindness of friends she would have been totally without the articles necessary for such an occasion. He did not even see after her having a doctor. She had to supply her husband with money, and he frequently pledged her clothes and jewelry, and all she had from the profession she got from engagements. He made use of very bad language, and a few weeks after the marriage the respondent struck her. He was subsequently tried at the Middlesex Sessions, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment for obtaining money by false pretences. Witness was very ill from his misconduct, and after that ceased to live with him. The respondent was now in Holloway Prison for felony. Abundant other proof was given to substantiate the charges, and Lord PENZANCE granted the prayer of the petition."....Prof. RICHARD MULDER, accompanied by his wife, Mme. MULDER-FABBRI, his adopted daughter, ANNA ELENA, a clever pianiste, twelve years of age, and Herr JACOB MEYLER, first baritone of the Frankfort Opera, were at latest advices in England, on the way to New-York, and the Daily News correspondent from Paris gives the theatrical doings following: "The Theatres," he says, "have begun to open again, the Gymnase leading the way. It is the only theatre in Paris that has kept a good company together, and the company is very good indeed—thoroughly artistic. Let me state a small fact which goes far to account for the success of the performance at the Gymnase Theatre. I went there on Saturday night, and thought I should stay for the first piece, as I saw the name of Mlle. DESCLÉE, the best actress in the theatre, probably at this moment the best in France, set down among those of the performers. She certainly appeared, but she had an accent little pure, in which she had to utter half a dozen words. She was all in the background—the part was nothing—and by no human ingenuity could anything be made of it. Not the first actress in the theatre took this part, and walked through it as if she were a mere walking-lady of the stage or a supernumerary. In the first place, take note of loss as discipline. There is no such thing as discipline known in France, except in the world of art. In the world of art—it may be that there is even too much of school—or too—settled rule—fixed style. But, at any rate, it is pleasing anywhere in France to meet with signs of discipline. In England, where much less of artistic discipline. We have no such thing as a school anywhere. Everybody has his own ways, wishes to be forewarned, and refuses to submit to a general plan. In a theatre all the promising actors are starred—and the stars insist on shining as of themselves. Mme. NILSSON is in England—I would think it infinitely beneath her to take a mere walking part in a piece. She must occupy the front of the stage, and no one must come between her and the footlights. I wish that every actor and actress of mark in England could come to Paris and see the worthless, undistinguished part which DESCLÉE plays in 'Les Grandes Dames.' It is because a great actress can descend to such a part in France, that the French stage is at this moment the first in the world"....We have Australian dates to March 27. Mrs. MARY GLADSTANE terminated an engagement at the Theatre Royal, Melbourne, on the 10th of that month, appearing for her farewell benefit as Julia in "The Hunchback." On the 11th, Mr. J. B. Howe, an English actor well known in New-York and San Francisco for hilking several stock companies that had engaged to support him, commenced an engagement, appearing as Hamlet. On the 15th he appeared as Richard, on the 18th as Count de Beaux, one of his best characters....Mr. HELLEN was in Melbourne.

TOWN PUMPS.

How our Grandfathers Got their Supply of Drinking Water—Historical Reminiscences of New-York.

There are many New-Yorkers who remember, with pleasure, the town pumps of twenty years ago, before Croton, then in its infancy, had spread its labyrinth of pipes, and forced its way to the tops of the loftiest buildings of the metropolis. There is but little sentiment about the brass cocks and pigs in our houses, by which water now finds an outlet; but there is convenience, pure water—which many of the old City pumps did not furnish—and a grandeur in the immensity of the water-works which compensates for the absence of the pumps and the sentiment.

New-York was first supplied with water by buckets drawn from the wells. The first well was dug in front of the old fort during the infancy of the remotest ancestor of our oldest Knickerbocker family. The second one was dug at Coenties slip, in front of the old City Hall. Six wells were ordered to be dug in 1677, at the expense of the inhabitants of the different streets in which they were situated, and to this number were added seven others in 1687. It was not until about 1750 that pumps came into use in this City, at which time a law was passed to raise money by tax from the citizens for pumps to be used in the wells. The pump which appears to have given the most satisfaction to our forefathers, and whose history comes down to us with the best reputation for pure and wholesome water, is the one known in olden times as the Tea-water Pump. This name was given the pump on account of the superior excellence of its water for the manufacture of tea over that of other pumps and wells in the City. Before this pump was erected, (about 1756,) the spring over which it stood bubbled from the ground in a hollow or dell at the present junction of Chatham-street and Roosevelt, and, forming a brook ran across the road to the fresh pond known as the Calchhook Kolch, or Collect, which, surrounded with high hills, received the timid offering into its depths, which tradition said were fathomless, and which, upon undoubted Knickerbocker authority, were fully fifty feet from top to bottom. The massive Tombs and other ponderous structures now occupy the space once filled by the waters of the collect, and panting ear-burdened horses are now urged up a steep incline.

On an iron track and stony street, where once shouting boys ran down the green hillside to swim in the pond, and anglers, with long strings of fish caught in its waters, climbed the ascent, going homeward over the Tea-water Spring Brook, a rude bridge was thrown; and there, in the pleasant Summer evenings, the lovers of the day delighted to stroll, and any maiden decoyed into crossing the bridge was forced to pay the forfeit of a kiss to her cavalier. This custom gave to it the name of the Kissing Bridge—so says the ancient chronicle. Some years after the pump was erected over the Tea-water Spring it was surrounded with ornamented grounds and called the Tea-water Gardens.

The majority of the wells in the City held water so poor and disagreeable in taste that even horses refused to drink it. Hundreds of watermen supplied the citizens from the Tea-water Pump, and made a good income out of the business. About this time CHRISTOPHER COLLES' plan for the construction of a reservoir and water-works on the east side of Broadway, between Pearl and White streets, to supply the City with water, adopted in 1754 by the Corporation, was about to be put into successful operation, and a reservoir was finally erected; but the work was abandoned after the occupation of the City by the British Army.

A well dug for a pump, in Spring, near Greene-street, in the year 1800, by the Manhattan Company, to supply pure and wholesome water to the City, had its waters rendered distasteful, and, standing alone within a half-mile of any houses, was avoided by the superstitious as an uncanny spot. This feeling was the direct result of the horrible and mysterious murder of Miss ELIZA SANDS, whose body was found in a well. The history of the case, which created a great sensation at the time, is to be found in the chronicles of the Courts. The Tea-water Pump was much vexed in this year to supply water to extinguish a large fire in Vesey-street, from which the steeple of St. Paul's Church caught its beacon blaze, but was extinguished by a man who climbed up and put it out. For many years the City received a great part of its drinking water from a pump in Pearl-street, and, like the Tea-water Pump, casks were filled from it, and carried to the houses of citizens by watermen who were paid for the service. Thirty-five years ago there were at least as many as 700 pumps on the island, but a very small proportion gave good water. To keep these pumps in good order, and make every effort to improve the condition of the water, required the attention of a numerous body of officials. Water from the Croton River was received through the aqueduct into the reservoir on Eighty-sixth-street on June 27, 1837, and on July 4, of the same year, into the Murray Hall Reservoir. On Oct. 14, the introduction of Croton water into the City was celebrated with great rejoicing by its inhabitants. It was some years before mains were laid in the principal parts of the City; and, even at the present writing, a considerable portion of the upper end of the island is deprived of its advantages, and the people depend upon pumps for water. A famous pump, which entirely supplied the Fourteenth Ward with water, stood on the corner of Mulberry and Prince streets. Another well was dug, and a pump put up at the corner of Crosby-street and Prince, and still stands there in a dilapidated condition. This pump, with one other on the corner of Avenue A and Third-street, are the only two pumps left below Fourteenth-street.

One of the clerks in the Bureau of Water Rents informed an inquirer that he had once a sort of supervision over the pumps in the City, and that there were, to state from memory, about 103 pumps within the City limits. About a dozen were situated below Sixty-eighth-street, and the remainder above this line. To this inquirer was referred to the office of the Purveyor, where a record is kept, but that official, upon learning that the information was desired for the TIMES, declined to give it, while the writer no more perfect data to work upon than a number of pumps at presents in New-York than that furnished by the clerk in the Bureau of Water Rents, which is, no doubt, not far from correct. From the annual reports of the Croton Board it appears that while a great number of the old wells in the City are filled up, the others are only covered, and could be again put to use should any unlooked-for necessity demand it. Twenty-two inspectors are appointed to look out for these pumps, one to each Ward, and also to report the accidental bursting of Croton water-pipes, &c. They are required to report once a day at the Police Stations, and at stated intervals to the Croton Board, and receive a handsome salary for their arduous labors, which might be, as they are generally, performed by the policemen while patrolling their beats. The salary paid to Inspectors in the Bureau of Water Rents is about $2 per day, which is said to be the pay allowed to all inspectors in the employment of the Board; the position of pump inspector being something of a sinecure, was probably the cause of the Purveyor's refusal to answer. Two thousand two hundred and twenty dollars and fifty-one cents were expended in 1869 for repairing wells and pumps, and in the reports of other official statements in regard to the condition of the present, which may be hereafter added, the further history of New-York pumps is left to be continued until the sealed [illegible] opened.

A Vermont Widower's Dilemma.

A young widower in Windham County, Vermont, as we read in one of the papers of that State, greatly in need of a housekeeper, rode day after day in a vain search. At last, almost discouraged, he drew up in front of a small dwelling among the hills, and asked the customary question: "Can you tell me where I can get a woman to do the work in a farm-house?" "Where are ye from?" asked the old man, viewing the handsome horse and buggy with a critical air. "My name is ——, and I am from ——." "Oh, yes! I've heard of you; you lost your wife a spell ago. Well, I've got six gals—good gals, too, and you may take your pick among 'em for a wife; but they wouldn't think of 'em think of going out for work. I should like to have one of 'em, but I guess you'll have to look elsewhere. Sarah Ann is the oldest, and her chance ain't quite so good seein' as she's nigh-sighted, and can't hear very well; but if you don't want her, you can take your pick of the others." The young widower went in, selected the best-looking one, drove up to Justice's and was married, and carried his bride home that very night. He secured a permanent and efficient housekeeper, who proves thus far in every way satisfactory, with no question of wages and no limit to the work she is expected to do.

GEORGIA.

The "New Departure," (Agricultural)—Bibb County Agricultural Society Fair—The Crops, Weather and Other Interesting Topics.

From Our Own Correspondent.

MACON, Ga., Monday, June 19, 1871.

It was my good fortune to be present on Saturday, the 17th inst., at the first Fair of the Bibb County Agricultural Society, an organization which has had a nominal existence for some years, but which, since the commencement of this year, under active, zealous and intelligent management, has become the most important, useful and enterprising county agricultural society in the State.

A REMARKABLE COUNTY SHOW.

As the premium list was necessarily limited in value and extent, the means of the members being quite out of proportion to their desires, and as the season of the year was supposed to be unfavorable to a large exhibition or a numerous attendance, it was not expected that the first Fair would be "much of a show." But this calculation proved to be altogether erroneous. I have seen State Fairs at which the exhibition of vegetables, fruits, flowers and field crops was, not as fine or as varied as that which I saw here, and I think that I do not exaggerate when I estimate the crowd upon the grounds at five thousand persons. There were specimens of every imaginable garden vegetable, and as fine as it is possible to produce. The fruits—peaches, pears, apples, plums, strawberries—were largely represented by the choicest and best of their kinds, and the display of butter, bread, preserves, home-made wines and cordials, though not extensive, was first-rate in quality. There was an exhibition, too, of farming implements of Bibb County manufacture, which reflected great credit on the skill, ingenuity and enterprise of the people. Competent judges pronounced the plows and cultivators to be admirably adapted to the soil and crops for which they are intended, and all whose business it is to till the earth were rejoiced to see that native energy and inventive genius are being directed to the home manufacture of those articles of prime necessity. Several cotton-gins and plantation horse-powers, a portable forge, and other useful machines, all of home invention and manufacture, were exhibited and attracted a large share of attention. The flower show and the exhibition of paintings and drawings by the ladies of Bibb County prove that the esthetical has not been neglected in the pursuit of the material. The flowers and floral designs were exquisite, and exquisitely arranged, and the oil-paintings, crayon drawings and pencil sketches had much merit in design and execution.

COMPETITION AMONG THE COLORED MEN.

Great interest was manifested by the people of Macon and of the County of Bibb. All classes were represented. One of the first entries of vegetables in the morning was by an industrious freedman, and none were more eager or competed more anxiously for the prizes than the colored gardeners and farm hands of the exhibitors.

THE GROUNDS.

The competition for the premiums, the efforts to succeed, the wide-spread interest felt in the occasion, the rare excellence of the articles, the good management, order, and regularity of the proceedings, the picturesque beauty of the grounds, with their majestic forest trees, green-sward—bordered on one side along its whole length by the Ocmulgee River—and their wide extent, and the uninterrupted fineness of the day, made the Fair one of the most enjoyable gatherings I have ever known.

THE NEW ERA.

But it had a wider significance and a greater importance, which justify me in devoting this letter to its description. It showed that the agriculturists of Georgia are taking a "new departure," from which they expect better results, and in which they take a deeper interest than the platforms, schemes and manœuvres of political parties. It proved that diversification of crops, domestic comforts, small industries, home manufactures and improved tillage are receiving the recognition and attention they merit, and that farmers are beginning to see the value of the co-operation, co-intelligence, exchange of views and information, friendly rivalry and generous emulation, which result from these agricultural societies and their exhibitions. Hon. SAMUEL BARNETT, the Commissioner of the State Agricultural Society, who has spent several months this year traveling over the State, encouraging the formation of county and neighborhood agricultural societies, was present at this Fair, and made a short address full of good sense and practical instruction. He informed me that wherever he has been he has been gratified by the almost universal interest manifested in the effort to introduce an improved system of agriculture, and by the individual and collective efforts that are being made to promote material independence by farmers endeavoring to raise all their own supplies. The wonderful strides that have been made during the past twelve months in the production of clover and grasses, are among the most cheering evidences of the "new departure." It used to be considered impossible to grow clover successfully in this climate. Now all over the State luxuriant clover "patches" are to be found, yielding three and four and even five tons of fine hay per acre at one cutting, and next year the area in clover and grass will be doubled and trebled. Formerly very few men knew what lucerne meant. Now it is to be found growing rankly in several places. Small grains are now receiving much care, and are regarded as among the most profitable and important of plantation crops. Preparations are being made to plant largely of turnips, and a few are about to make the experiment whether marigold wurzel will do well in this climate. Improved stock are being purchased; sheep husbandry is attracting attention; planters are making preparations to raise their own mules and horses. Green manuring, rotation of crops, deep cultivation of land, labor-saving machinery, all those things which enlightened agriculturists have pronounced to be essential to agricultural success, are making a lodgment in the public mind, and giving cheering promise that the "new departure" will produce the happiest results. All this is attributable, in a great measure, at least, if not altogether, to the persistent, well-directed, and enlightened efforts of the agricultural Press of the State, edited and controlled by men of prominence and ability, who have turned their thoughts away from the field of politics and parties, and directed them diligently to the more inviting field of agriculture.

A PARALLEL.

During the past week the weather has been comparatively dry—that is, the rain has not been copious. The farmers, I can assure you, have "improved each shining hour," and waged as relentless a war on grass and weeds as ever the Versaillists waged on those praiseworthy patriots, the "soldiers of the Commune." There are some points of resemblance between the two conflicts. The Versaillists, in conquering the Commune, were compelled to destroy much which they were anxious to preserve. So with the planters in killing the grass; they have been obliged to do considerable injury to the crops. I am satisfied that in those places where the grass had gained most headway, the stand of cotton, after cleaning, is not more than one-half of what would be truly called a "good stand." The effort to take advantage of the fair days has been very earnest, and most actively have the negroes aided it. Men, women and children have turned out to "kill grass," and great has been the slaughter. Wheat and oats have been seriously damaged by rust, but a good crop has been harvested. Corn looks well and promises an immense yield. It is now being "laid by" in this latitude. The yield of fruit is immense, but the quality has been impaired by heavy rains and insects.

THE NEW TREATY.

Earl Russell's Motion Against its Ratification in the English House of Lords—Remarks of Earl de Grey—Proceedings in the House of Commons.

In the House of Lords, on June 12, Earl RUSSELL'S motion of an address against the Treaty of Washington was made and discussed. A complete summary of the debate reached us on June 13 by the cable. We append, however, the text of Earl DE GREY'S remarks in defense of the treaty.

EARL DE GREY'S SPEECH.

He said: "I am sure no apology was needed from the noble Earl who has just sat down for exercising his undoubted right to criticise the Treaty of Washington, and I am equally certain no one could complain of the temper in which his strictures have been made. But I do not think the case he has endeavored to make out will be indorsed by the country. The noble Earl has told us that my noble friend (Earl GRANVILLE) gave as his principal reason for having recommended Her Majesty to send out the Commission that he had learnt from many persons that there exists at the present time a very wide-spread feeling of irritation in the United States with respect to this question. My noble friend, however, gave a very different reason; for he said that he had learnt from very good authority—and I can confirm from personal knowledge the accuracy of the statements made to him—that there are at the present time many reasonable men in the United States who desire to see this question settled; that although much irritation had prevailed upon the subject, and still existed among certain classes, yet that information in his possession showed that a different feeling was springing up among influential merchants and politicians, and that, therefore, the time had arrived, now that agitation was dying out, for making an effort to settle the question. I cannot doubt for one moment that at the time we were sent to the United States there did exist in that country among many of the parties and of all classes, an earnest desire to see these difficulties brought to a conclusion, and the relations between the two countries placed upon the most friendly and durable footing. I would now make a few observations upon the various objections which my noble friend has urged against the details of the treaty. In the first place, I do not, of course, mean to say that a noble Lord is not entitled to take exception to the assertion made by my noble friend, that those who represented this country upon the Joint High Commission at Washington displayed what he called a lamb-like weakness throughout those negotiations, and I must also express my regret that the noble Earl, who took part in the attack upon Her Majesty's Commissioners should have left the House before one of the Commissioners has had the opportunity of making his defense. So far from our conduct being a constant course of concession, there were, as my noble friend behind me has said, numerous occasions on which it was our duty to say that the proposals made to us were such as it was impossible for us to think of entertaining. Nothing can be more easy than to take the course adopted by my noble friend opposite, and to say that all the demands we rejected were preposterous; that it would have been absurd to entertain them, while those upon which concession was made were the only ones really in dispute. My noble friend says that no arbitrator would have entertained a claim for what the Americans term our premature recognition of belligerent rights, and the consequent prolongation of the war. That may be true, but in the conventions to which my noble friend appended his name it would have been open to the Americans to adduce arguments on that point. My noble friend has adopted a very easy method of dealing with questions connected with the treaty which he does not desire to enter into any observations. He says they are of no importance, or that they were matters which could be settled with the utmost facility. My noble friend took as an instance the case of the island of San Juan; but so far from that question being settled with the utmost facility, it was one of those which caused us the greatest trouble. Then the noble Earl turned to the consideration of that which is undoubtedly the most important part of this treaty, and that which forms the staple part of the motion of the noble Earl who has left the House. I was not surprised to find that with his usual caution and with his usual logic it was not the intention of my noble friend to support the motion of the noble Earl on the ground of the sentiments which he uttered in the course of the arguments which my noble friend addressed to the House upon this subject, he very carefully separated himself from the line of argument sketched out in the motion before your Lordships' House. My noble friend, before he came to speak of the three rules in the sixth article of this treaty, said a few words about the expression of regret, and I was glad to find that my noble friend did not make any serious criticism on the course pursued by the Commissioners in respect to that matter. But my noble friend repeated that which was previously asserted by the noble Earl, Lord RUSSELL, and with Mr. BARNARD on the subject, who have all of them given us the fullest assurance that the understanding referred to in the first part of the honorable and learned gentleman's question is that of the United States in reference to this matter; and further, that I have been in our power to communicate with the distinguished gentleman who has arrived in this country as the representative of the United States, who was a member of the Joint High Commission—Gen. SCHENCK—who has informed Her Majesty's Government that such was his understanding of the meaning of the rule in question; and, indeed, we have been told by that gentleman that the President of the United States himself understands the rule in that sense, and that the latter would himself be the first, not only to admit and allow, but to contend for that construction of the rule in question. With regard to the third part of the honorable and learned gentleman's question, I am able to state that Mr. FISH, the United States' Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who was also one of the Commissioners, has expressed an opinion that it would be of great importance if the two Governments were to make a joint declaration which should place the meaning of this rule beyond all chance of misconstruction. I believe that communications have been entered into between some of the British Commissioners and some of the United States Commissioners and other distinguished authorities of America on the subject, and that they also have come to the conclusion that it is impossible to entertain the slightest doubt but that the meaning to be attached to the terms of the treaty is that which the contracting parties themselves attach to them."

Proofs From the Discussion.

From the London Times, June 13.

The conclusion to which we must come after this full discussion of the treaty is that the solid advantages to be derived from it greatly overbalance its deficiencies. Though we are disposed to agree with Lord DERBY that the "general feeling of irritation" prevalent in America may be exaggerated, and though we willingly admit that it is not a wise policy to yield everything in order to conciliate an opponent, yet we do not recognize that the present treaty has been unduly influenced by these considerations. Lord GRANVILLE and Lord DE GREY show that on many points the American Commissioners receded, and that this is the case may be assumed from the fact that the Treaty has been criticised with quite as much hostility in America as here. With regard to the question of arbitration, we apprehend there is nothing to complain of. Not only is the application of this principle to the settlement of these important questions in itself a victory of civilization, but in the choice of the Chiefs of States who are to appoint the Arbitrators, there is a sufficient pledge for impartiality. After disputes so long and the expression of opinions so irreconcilable, it is impossible that any agreement should fully satisfy either party. Direction will, we think, convince any impartial critic that the claims growing out of the civil war could hardly be settled more successfully. After the speech of Lord CAIRNS it was to be expected that the motion should be withdrawn. The discussion has not been without its use, but the practical decision was necessarily against a resolution which involved nothing less than a condemnation of the whole treaty.

The Rescue of the Crew of the Saginaw—Testimonial to Capt. Thomas Long.

Capt. THOMAS LONG, who had charge of the expedition dispatched from Honolulu to rescue the wrecked crew of the United States steamer Saginaw, has received at the hands of His Excellency H. A. PEIRCE, American Minister resident there, a magnificent gold watch from the United States Government for his services on that occasion. In acknowledgment, Capt. LONG has written the following letter:

HONOLULU, April 29, 1871.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your kind letter of the 28th inst., together with the valuable testimonial in recognition of my services in the steamer Kilauea, in relieving the wrecked officers and crew of the United States steamer Saginaw. I can truly say that the selection of myself by this Government for the performance of this duty, was in itself a sufficient recompense for any sacrifice I may have made. But the very valuable present which the United States Government has transmitted to me through your hand requires an acknowledgment from myself. I beg, therefore, that you will transmit to the Honorable Secretary of the Navy and Admiral WINSLOW my sincere thanks for their great kindness, and assure them that, although domiciled in a foreign land, I have not forgotten my country; and that if at any time my services are required for the relief of my countrymen in distress, I shall always be ready.

Trusting, my dear Sir, please accept my thanks for your kindness in regard to myself and to the United States Government, in your most favorable light. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS LONG.

To Hon. H. A. PEIRCE, United States Minister Resident.

SATAN IN A BLACK HOG.

How Six Hundred and Odd Mogs Made an Excitement Among the Chinamen, and How a County Friend Meet Them from Hell.

From the Virginia (Nevada) Enterprise, June 10.

The Chinese residents of the eastern part of this city last night had another musical tussle with the devil—a tussle of exceeding great vehemence. A large drove of hogs, nearly all black, was lately brought from California by the ALEXANDERS, the well-known stock men, and turned into a vacant lot near Chinatown. The first day that the hogs were put into this lot the fence was constantly lined with Celestials, feasting from without their pig-eyes upon the pigs within. Some rolled rocks against the high and tight plank fence, and standing tiptoe leaned longingly upon the plump ones of the herd; others doubled into the form of the figure four, and bent one eye upon the grand display of pork in the raw state, through such favoring cracks and knot-holes as they could find. The heads—and tails—above the fence wagged to the heads—and tails—at the knot-holes, and there was a power of goose-talk and gesticulation. The many pairs of glittering eyes, and the broad mouths that trinkled at with brown gravy, boded no good to the mere favored in flesh among the occupants of that big pig-pen; for, though a Chinaman will, any day or night, barter his liberty for a yellow-legged hen, he will unhesitatingly sell his soul for a fat hog. From all the tumble-down shanties in Chinatown came the Celestial inhabitants, great and small; male and female came they, as the animals went into the ark, all to gaze through cracks and knot holes, and over the fence and under the fence, and feast their eyes on that drove of six hundred and odd fat pigs. A great many blouse and blue shirts, round and umbrella hats, dangling queus and gird of Paradise head-dresses, or a more animated assemblage has seldom been seen. All the afternoon, and till the sun had dipped behind the peak of Mount Davidson, this scene continued; then the great portal of the Joss-house, arrayed in his long blue robe, was seen coming from the temple, bearing in his hand an incense-pan, from which was spread upon the evening air the aroma of burning sandal wood. This wise disciple of Confucius, and big dog of the Buddhist tan-yard, walked in odoriferous silence about the inclosure, gazing intently through various cracks and knot-holes at the stolid porcine herd. At length he uttered a loud, wailing cry, which was taken up and echoed in every tone and accent of terror by men, women and children. He pointed out a particularly large, particularly fat and particularly wise and sagacious looking hog, dropped something into his incense-pan, which created a dense smoke and a stench which the very breeze seemed to hasten to leave behind, when he set up a chant, and swinging his incense-pan back and forth, began crawfishing from the place, safely guarding the rear of the now thoroughly-frightened sand restraining mob. That night there was a great uproar in Chinatown, and above all could be heard the tinkling cymbals and sounding brass which always announced that his Satanic Majesty has been unearthed. Ever since that night, the most profound silence of the whole musical portion of the Chinese population appear to have been required for the intimidation of "Auld Clootie." Last night the blue-robed big gun of the pagoda had all the people in front of that institution, where, in the yard, to the eastward of the gate, stood, large as life, the image of a black hog. This image was stuck full of burning joss-sticks, and as they were slowly consumed a great howling and pounding of gongs and kettle-drums was kept up. At length the high priest, rightly timing the burning of a fuse, entered the temple, and returning with one of their biggest wooden gods, stuck full of peacock feathers, muttered a short prayer or exorcism, when he elevated the idol, and, with a dull explosion and abominable stench, the image of the hog was blown into a thousand fragments. The priest rushed into the temple with the idol and shunned the multitude of the people scattered amid a great noise and "one grand stink," as a Frenchman would say. The hogs are now nearly all sold and gone from the pen, and the explanation of this whole affair seems to be this: The cunning priest saw in the drove of hogs a great temptation set before his people; unless he exerted himself they would be sure to go hog stealing, and get into trouble, and in order to prevent this, he went out into the hog-yard in their presence, and detected the devil in one of the beasts. He kept them in a terrible fright until nearly all the hogs were gone, when, by blowing up the image of the black hog, he sent the devil and all their troubles "kiting," taking unto himself and his ugly god all the glory of the achievement.

SATURDAY, June 24—P. M.

The Bank returns reflects steadiness of movement and continued ease in Money. The Gold average is $1,095,806 higher, and Greenbacks $317,706 lower than last Monday. The Loans increase $845,113, and the Deposits $369,263. In point of lawful Money strength to Deposits and Circulation the Banks stand about the same as on the previous report. The Treasury Office received during the week $2,836,850 in Gold for Customs; paid out $279,008 Gold for Interest on the Public Debt, and sold $1,000,000 Gold on Thursday. The Export of American Gold for the week was $1,873,155, and other Specie $698,275. The sales of Gold closed at 111⅜ ₱ cent., and of Bills on London 110⅝@110⅞ ₱ cent. The Public Funds advanced to 115⅛ ₱ cent. for the 5-20s of 1867. The other 5-20s ruled in about the same proportion.

At the Stock Exchange there was renewed activity on the Railway list, and on Western Telegraph. The Bull interest moved with some confidence, after the early morning prices, and with some exceptions like Wabash and North-west Common, prices were better than at the close on Friday. The party in Lake Shore evidently felt stronger, and there was a larger demand for New-York Central. Wabash sold below 57 ₱ cent., and North-west at 72¼@73 ₱ cent. The weakness in Hannibal and St. Joseph continued, sales at 73½ ₱ cent.

The Boards adjourned early, as usual on Saturdays in the Summer season. Later in the day the following quotations were made in front of the Exchange on Broad-street, as compared with Friday night:

The Commercial & Financial Chronicle, with this week's issue, completes the twelfth semi-annual volume of that very valuable business record and review. The customary title-page and index to the volume accompany the present number.

The Commercial of this afternoon reports that:

"At the meeting of their creditors, Messrs. DAVIES & TURNER stated their liabilities at about $180,000, and their cash assets at about $85,000. They reported their claim on Mr. WOODWARD as about $140,000. Their proposal was to pay twenty-five per cent. in cash, and the remaining seventy-five per cent. in notes, running at interest up to eighteen months or two years. The statement included amounts due depositors, who received the same offer as the creditors on contracts. A committee was appointed to examine the accounts of the firm, and report upon the advisability of accepting the offer."

The Mark Lane Express, of June 12, says:

"The week that has just passed, beyond an occasional outburst of hot sunshine, has been more like March than June, a strong north wind having mostly prevailed. For the last fortnight, therefore, there has been very little progress in vegetation, and that the earth warmed the roots more than the air has the foliage, the stoppage would have been entire and the mischief serious. Despairing of warm rains many have begun to cut their grass, and thus, though better than the wretched yield of last year, does not promise much of a crop; but as cut hay is getting exhausted it may be the wisest plan to be ready with the new. Where the wheat has stood the late severe changes, this weather is not bad for it, though any delay of the gathering in our present light crops must be a loss to the corner. The garden peas and some beans are in bloom, but there seems little chance for them with such frequent night frosts, while the wheat is all the safer for not being forward. Foreign advices respecting the growing crops are too much like our own to be a set off against poor prospects. There has been an early drouth in Spain, Algeria and some parts of France; and advices from Hungary are very unfavorable to the maize, which occupies nearly one-fourth of the cultivated ground; while the slow progress in Germany, and cold weather, are a continued theme, and keep up prices everywhere. New-York, which lately gave way and began to influence the London markets during the fine weather, notes some improvement in Breadstuffs, and our country markets again evince a hardening tendency, with several 1s. per quarter dearer. With the general averages 6d., and the London only 4½., there is not much prospect that the Metropolis will be favored with many samples, as the expenses of transit are considerably more than that difference. With anarchy put down at Paris and communications partly restored, we find prices high and French produce scarce, as there is a reasonable prospect that orders will soon cross the Channel; and should the French loan of 100,000,000 take, and the Government become buyers, the long-expected spurt may reach the coast as well as the London market. The arrivals off the coast since the 2d of June were 6 cargoes, of which 3 cargoes were Wheat, 2 Maize and 1 Barley. Business was reported as follows: Wheat, 3 cargoes in all, viz., Ghirka, 450 qrs.; soft Theodosia, 648; soft Varna, 445, 3d.; Spring, 550, 3d@7s. 1½d. Maize, 5 cargoes, at 22s. 3d.@23s. 3d. Rye, 2 cargoes, at 35s. 3d.@35s. 6d. Barley, 1 cargo, at 26s. 6d. Oats, 2 cargoes, at 21s. 6d. The sales of English Wheat noted last week were 68,608 quarters at 50s., against 87,545 quarters at 46s. 3d. in 1870. The London averages were 51s. on 2,162 quarters. The imports into the Kingdom for the week ending 3d of June were 760,710 cwts. Wheat, and 36,569 cwts. Flour.

The Cotton Trade.

From the Financial Chronicle.

By special telegrams received by us to-night from the Southern ports, we are in possession of the returns showing the receipts, exports, &c., of Cotton for the week ending this evening, June 23. From the figures thus obtained it appears that the total receipts for the seven days have reached 21,084 bales against 24,046 bales last week, 26,126 bales the previous week, and 26,403 bales three weeks since, making the total receipts since the 1st of September, 1870, 3,089,044 bales against 2,613,228 bales for the same period of 1869-70, showing an increase since Sept. 1 this year of 1,055,721 bales. The details of the receipts for this week (as per telegraph) and the corresponding week of 1870, are as follows:

Below we give the exports and stocks for the week, and also for the corresponding week of last season, as telegraphed to us from the various ports to-night:

From the foregoing statement it will be seen that, compared with the corresponding week of last season, there is an increase in the exports this week of 19,082 bales, while the stocks to-night are 3,934 bales less than they were at this time a year ago. The following is our usual table showing the movement of Cotton at all the ports from Sept. 1 to June 16, the latest mail dates. We do not include our telegrams to-night, as we cannot insure the accuracy or obtain the detail necessary by telegraph:

BANKING AND FINANCIAL.

☞ THE FIRST MORTGAGE SEVEN PER CENT. GOLD BONDS of the WEST WISCONSIN RAILWAY COMPANY offer a rare chance for safe and profitable investment. They are a first and only lien upon the Road, which is now nearly completed, the rolling stock, telegraph, land grant, and all the property of the Company. The lands are released from taxation, and are worth more than the whole amount of the mortgage. The Road will form the great air-line route from Chicago and Milwaukee to St. Paul and the North-west. Bonds for sale at 90 and interest in currency, by WHITE, MORRIS & CO., No. 18 Wall-st., and GWYNNE, JOHNSON & DAY, No. 16 Wall-st., where pamphlets and further information can be obtained.

☞ NOTICE.—The interest (due July 1, 1871, on the bonds of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company, indorsed by the State of Georgia, will be paid by the State on and after that date on the surrender of the coupons at the banking-house of Henry Clews & Co., No. 32 Wall-st.

RUFUS B. BULLOCK, Governor of Georgia.

☞ NOTICE.—The quarterly and semi-annual interest due July 1, 1871, on the Bonds of the State of Georgia, will be paid on and after that date, on the surrender of the Coupons at the Fourth National Bank. RUFUS B. BULLOCK, Governor of Georgia.

MILITARY GOSSIP.

The First Division will celebrate the ninety-fifth anniversary of our national independence on the 4th day of July next by parading and passing in review before his Honor the Mayor. The troops will be formed in close column of companies, right in front, head of each column resting on Bowery, as follows: Separate troop cavalry, on Fifth-street, east of Bowery; First Brigade, on Fourth-street, east of Bowery; Batteries C and G, on Fourth-street, west of Bowery; Second Brigade, on Third-street; Batteries B and K, on Great Jones-street; Third Brigade, on Second-street. The cavalry will be formed and paraded in the rear of the infantry of each Brigade. The column will march at 7 o'clock A. M., the separate troop of cavalry leading, the other organizations following, at proper intervals, in the order named. The line of march will be down Bowery to Canal-street, through Canal-street to Broadway, up Broadway to Waverley-place, through Waverley-place to Fifth-avenue, up Fifth-avenue to Fourteenth-street, through Fourteenth-street to Sixth-avenue, up Sixth-avenue to Thirty-fourth-street, through Thirty-fourth-street to Fifth-avenue, and down Fifth-avenue to Worth Monument, where the column will pass in review before his Honor the Mayor of the City, who will be accompanied by the members of the Common Council and heads of departments. The troops will be dismissed immediately thereafter. These streets and avenues, from curb to curb, are designated as the division parade-ground for the day. The commandant of Battery C will fire a national salute on the Battery at meridian. The following instructions are published for the guidance of the troops upon the parade: In passing in review, regimental commanders will cause as least three additional drummers or trumpeters to wheel out of the column with their bands, to beat the ruffles or sound the trumpet flourishes for a Major-General when the colors are drooped. The regimental bands, with the exception of that at the head of the division column, will not commence to play until within fifty paces of the reviewing officer. Attention is called to paragraph 9, form 2, article 3, appendix 2, Upton's Tactics, as follows: "As the troops are passing the reviewing officer, the music of each brigade will cease to play as soon as it has given the ruffles for the colors of the rear battalion; then the music of the succeeding brigade will commence to play and conform to the above."

In a recent speech at Auburn, N. Y., made in response to a serenade tendered him by the local military, Gov. Hoffman alluded to the criticism that has been passed on his opposition to a certain bill, appropriating $850,000 for an improved breech-loader for the State forces, and he stated that the parties at first applied for but $250,000, and the bill bound the State absolutely to accept a certain arm without any provisions for testing its merits. Under these circumstances he felt he had but one course to pursue, and so declared plainly that if the bill was not stopped in the Legislature, he would stop it by his veto. This is exactly what the Times stated a few days ago, though we did not expect the Governor to confess as much.

On Tuesday last the members of the Washington Continental Guard held their twenty-sixth annual picnic and Summer night's festival, at Sulzer's East River Park. The occasion was a very pleasant one, as Capt. John P. Lansing was, as usual, everywhere.

We have frequently spoken of the fact that the "Surgeon" of the Ninth Regiment is no physician at all, except that he "doctors" the honorary members of the organization. A private in the regiment sends us the following note, which shows the exact status of this "Surgeon:"

"Doctor (?) C. W. Pollard, Surgeon (?) of the Ninth Regiment is now holding his position contrary to all regulations and customs, he not being an educated physician; the Surgeon-General of the State has refused to commission him or either recommend his being commissioned, and he holds the position by force, contrary to law, and rides at the head of the fine regiment, his incompetency being a disgrace to him and his uniform. His assistant is a fine physician, and should be appointed the Surgeon of the Ninth."

The annual picnic and Summer night's festival of Post Sumner No. 24, G. A. R., for the benefit of the charity fund, will be held on Monday evening, the 3d prox. The arrangements for the affair are nearly completed, and the Committee intend that their guests shall have a pleasant time.

A Boston paper states that Col. Fisk, on Sunday last, made himself a custodian of the morals of one section of the South End, by ordering the bar of the St. James Hotel to be closed. He placed a guard at every door, and the bar remained closed till after the departure of his command. Probably a very necessary precaution.

The Twelfth Infantry will assemble to-morrow evening, at the State Arsenal, for dress parade. The evening will conclude with a brief promenade concert for the amusement of the friends of the regiment. Like the Ghost in "Hamlet," we could a tale unfold, if permitted, though it would not horrify any one. Suffice it to say that somebody will be very much surprised to-morrow evening, and he deserves to be. A secret, a dress parade and a promenade concert ought to fill the armory.

The encampment at Chautauqua Lake is now occupying to a great extent the minds of the members of the Seventy-fourth, of Buffalo. Two meetings of the battalion officers have been held, and much enthusiasm manifested. A large number of names have been handed in of those who expect to attend the encampment, and the affair promises to be not only pleasant and interesting, but profitable.

There are 3,000 volunteers at the Goderich camp in Canada, and 4,278 at the Niagara camp.

In Philadelphia, on the 4th of July, immediately after the division parade, a drill for the State champion colors, offered by Company H, of the Eighth Regiment, Gray Guards, Capt. Robinson, will take place on Penn-square.

Wm. H. Jessup, Esq., has been appointed Major-General of the Tenth Division Pennsylvania National Guard, and the Senate promptly confirmed him.

We have already stated that the surviving members of the Forty-fourth Regiment, New-York Volunteers, (Ellsworth's Avengers,) purpose holding a reunion at Albany on the 8th of August next. The Committee having the matter in charge have issued a circular inviting suggestions, &c.; also requesting their address to forward the names and Post-office address of any members known to them to the Secretary, Edward Low, Post-office Box No. 1, Albany, N. Y. Should this meet the eye of any member not officially notified of the contemplated meeting he will, upon communicating the fact to the Secretary, receive such notification.

Edward E. Greenleaf, of Wiscoasi, private in Company A, First Regiment, Vermont Volunteer Militia, has been promoted to the position of First Lieutenant and Adjutant, vice George N. Bingham, removed from the State. Adjutant Greenleaf served through the war with credit, and rose as First Lieutenant to command a company in the First Vermont Light Battery.

The elegant and elegant room at the southwest corner of Eleventh and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia, has been rented by the Ninth Regiment for a head-quarters, and for the storage of arms. It will elegantly fitted up for that purpose.

The drill for the Massachusetts State championship will occur next Wednesday. The companies are hard at work, and the Montgomerys are now improving rapidly. The indications are that the drill will be a very sharp one. The Boston City Guard recently selected Major Douglas First Battalion, as their umpire, and the Montgomerys Col. B. F. Finan, of the Ninth Regiment. The referee will be chosen to-morrow. The First Battalion will escort the City Guard to and from the Common, and the Montgomerys have been tendered an escort by several companies of the Ninth.

By authority of the Board of Directors of THE NEW-YORK RAILWAY COMPANY, and in conformity with the terms of the act of incorporation in that respect, the undersigned, Commissioners and Stock Subscriptions, give public notice for and on behalf of the directors of such Company, that books of subscription for the capital stock thereof will be opened on WEDNESDAY, the 26th day of June, inst., at the following places in this City, viz.:
At the banking-house of DUNCAN, SHERMAN & CO., No. 21 Nassau-st.
At the banking-house of the BANK OF THE METROPOLIS, No. 31 Union-square.
The Company is authorized to construct two viaduct railways or branches through the City of New-York, on the east and west sides thereof, from a common starting-point at or near Chambers-st., between Broadway and Chatham-st.; also across the Harlem River and through Westchester County; with power to build additional lines of railway or branches, from time to time, in any part of the City or Westchester County. The property acquired by the Company is exempted from taxes and assessments during the period allowed for the final completion of the railway in the City. The Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of New-York are authorized and directed, with the approval of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, to subscribe for five millions of dollars of the stock of the Company, whenever one million of dollars thereof has been subscribed for by private parties. This conditional amount of stock has been wholly subscribed for and taken by the directors of the Company. On the completion of either of the lines of railway to the line of Westchester County, the Supervisors of that county are authorized to issue the bonds of the county to such amount as the Supervisors shall deem expedient, to aid in the construction and extension of the railway in and through that county. For the proper equalization of the interest of shareholders who may subscribe and pay in moneys at different times, the directors are authorized to issue scrip for interest on such payments, payable out of the earnings.
The terms of subscription will be as follows:
TEN per cent of the amount of stock subscribed for to be paid in cash at the time of subscription. The residue to be paid as called for by the Board of Directors on a notice of thirty days, but no call at any one time to exceed ten per cent.
Scrip for interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum will be issued by the Company, payable out of the first earnings of the railway on all instalments paid on stock subscribed for within thirty days after the subscription-books shall be opened.
The Company reserves the right to close the subscription-books at any time after the 26th day of July, 1871.
By order of the Board of Directors.

Welcome to the Visitors—Greeting of Mayor Hall—The March Through the Rain—Decorations About Town—Scenes at the Headquarters.

The arrival in this City of the vocalists of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other cities, which would have been signalized by a splendid reception, was celebrated under untoward circumstances, the rain-storm reducing the affair to a comparatively brief transaction. However, the reception took place, though in an abbreviated shape, and the singers, the visitors as well as the New-Yorkers were, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, in good spirits. In spite of the incessant rain, the sidewalks and streets in the vicinity of head-quarters were beleaguered by a vast crowd of sight-seers, gathered to await the arrival of the escort, to surround the visiting vocalists, and which long before their arrival had started to meet them.

THE ESCORT.

The north-eastern Saengerbund Societies assembled at the Germania Assembly Rooms at 6 o'clock in the afternoon, when line was formed for the reception of the visitors, under the direction of the Marshal, Major SAUER, in the following order:

Liederkranz, Suavian Saengerbund, Sing Academie, Melomanen Society, Harlem Maennerchor, Hudson Maenner-chor, Mozart Verein Liederkranz, platoon of Police under Capt. MOUNT.

Marshal and aids, officers of the Saengerbund Societies, Arion Society, Concordia Maennerchor, Arminia Uhland Bund.

Beethoven Maennerchor, Harmonia Society, Hoboken Unartett, Teutonia Society, Rheinish Saengerbund, Harmonie, Winsley Liederkranz.

Bohtlerbund, Saengerrunde, Brooklyn Saengerbund, Mozart Maennerchor, Liedertafel of the Social Reform Social Science, Social Reform Vocal Society.

THE DOWNWARD MARCH.

Shortly before 8 o'clock the procession passed down the Bowery and marched to the City Hall Park, where, at about 9 o'clock, the visiting societies of Baltimore, Philadelphia and other localities made their appearance. The arrival of the visiting singers was marked by the firing of rockets. The visitors were duly welcomed by the Mayor and the Honorary Committee.

MAYOR HALL'S ADDRESS.

The Mayor delivered the following address:

Welcome! welcome! It often becomes my pleasing privilege to welcome municipal guests. Welcome! That is the most hearty word in the English language. Whenever uttered it vibrates over the heartstrings of both host and guest. I heartily give it now. And I give it without a dissenting voice among my vast constituency. Sometimes the latter differ about the welcome of municipal guests. Sometimes these represent a party or a locality, or a limited class of people. Not so to-night. They who bring with them music, enrich the agreeable emotions of all. Your welcome is an unanimous one. Your associations harmony, and not discord. Music is the speech of a land that all upon some day or other call Fatherland. You were born in, or are descendants of those who were born in the land of song. The German citizens have done much toward aiding and instructing the popular affection for music. Your national love for it ameliorates the plainer characteristics of our business life.

You come to constitute a congress of musicians. It will be pleasant to have one harmonious Congress. Whenever you may lodge, or walk in this great metropolis, you will hear a popular chorus of welcome, hearty and sincere; and when you must go, may the echoes of your voices and the memory of that universal New-York welcome long linger in our hearts and in yours.

AT THE HEAD-QUARTERS.

The visitors were then escorted to the Germania Assembly Rooms, where the flags of the visiting singers were delivered to the Finis Committee, and an address of welcome was spoken by the Buade's President, Dr. HEIDENFELDT, who, in a brief discourse, reviewed the improvements achieved in the cultivation of German art and song in this country. The remarks of the Bundes President were received with long continued applause. The visiting societies, after partaking of refreshments provided for them, thereupon marched to the different quarters assigned for them.

EARLY ARRIVALS.

The societies from Rhode Island, Connecticut and points of the interior of New-York, who arrived at different times during the day, were received by the Reception Committee on their arrival at the depot, and thence escorted to head-quarters.

THE DECORATIONS.

Decorations along the line of march, and indeed throughout the City, were in course of preparation yesterday, on an extensive scale, and in many instances, notably the "German quarters" on the east side presented a festive appearance. The German newspaper office—the Staats Zeitung, the Demokrat and others were adorned with flags and banners, representing a variety of nationalities. Along the line of the procession, numerous buildings were splendidly illuminated. The head-quarters structure, the Germania Assembly Rooms, presented without as well as within, a most picturesque appearance. The front of the edifice was bedecked from the base of the roof with flags and bunting of every description, and transparencies with significant inscriptions were abundant. In the centre towered colossal figures representing the muses, and below these, forming with them a group, were the busts of MOZART and BEETHOVEN. The Skating Rink was yesterday in the hands of the decorators, and will to-day, as the general rehearsal have the aspect of a fairy scene. The rear is covered by a blue star-spangled curtain. Red drapery with gold fringes hides the walls, and is embellished with the portraits of the leading German composers. The conductor's desk shows on each side toward the auditory a gigantic lyre, garlands, flags and bunting beautify the space below the ceiling. The numerous society head-quarters, where the visiting societies are quartered, were also fully decorated, many on a magnificent scale; as for instance, Lieder-Kranz Hall, the new Beethoven Club-house, the Arion Hall, and others.

PROGRAMME FOR TODAY.

This forenoon, at 10 o'clock, a general rehearsal of the vocalists is to take place at the Skating Rink, when "Frithjofsagar" and "Das Morgenlied" will be rehearsed. These compositions are to be rendered at the principal concert, at the Skating Rink, to-morrow evening. During the afternoon, the different societies will accompanying their guests on excursions in various directions. In the evening the reception concert will come off at the Academy of Music, when the following programme will be interpreted: 1. "Lobgesang," cantate for solis, chor and orchestra, by MENDELSOHN, sung by the grand men's chorus, under the direction of Mr. PAUR. 2. First movement of the violin concert in D. Op. 61, by LUDWIG VON BEETHOVEN. Performed by Dr. L. DAMROSCH. 3. "Reimi" Chorus (Battle Chorus) by WAGNER, executed under the direction of CARL BERGMANN. 4. Overture by LIEDERKRANZERS, under the direction of CARL BERGMANN. "Lobgesang" will be rendered by the Gemischer Chorus, composed of gentlemen and lady vocalists of the Liederkranz and Sing Academie.

GENERAL NOTES.

At a meeting of the Honorary Committee, Mr. HUGO WESENDANCK was selected to deliver the oration on Tuesday.... It is estimated that some 1,500 visiting vocalists are sojourning in this City, quartered at the different head-quarters of the North-eastern Saengerbund societies, at the expense of the Saengerbund, they last night, after the reception, were engaged in impromptuized festivities. The Baltimore Liederkranz was quartered at Liederkranz Hall, which on this occasion was fully illuminated. The Arion Society entertained the Fung Maennerchor of Philadelphia, The Saengerbunde marched its guests, the Germania Maennerchor of Baltimore, in triumph to the head-quarters of the Germania Assembly Rooms, and engaged in what is called a commers. A similar series of jollifications were provided for the guests at the Beethoven Club-house, and at nearly all other Saengerd headquarters, which are disseminated throughout the City.... A delegation of the Orpheus Society had arrived to participate in the Saengerfest festivities, and had been warmly welcomed. A society of Reading, the Reading Maennerchor, will reach New-York on Tuesday.

Singular Case of Supposed Suicide.

JOSEPH BARWELL, cutter in a tailoring store, was found dead in his room at No. 84 Perry-street on Friday evening. It appears that a week ago he left his position in consequence of some trouble with his employer, and since that time had been drinking to excess. Friday morning he did not leave his room, and in the evening was found dead in his bed, partially dressed. Yesterday Dr. WOOSTER BEACH made a post-mortem examination, but the body was already so decomposed that the cause of death could not be determined. There was a diary found among his effects, in which was written: "Farewell, my dear friends and relatives. I am going in for the grand secret; heart-sick and weary of the world, I take the chances. I shall not be much missed, except by one." Then far it was written in English, but the following was in German: "Dearly-beloved wife, my heart is broken; without thee I cannot live. God bless thee, and may we meet again, where there is neither marrying or giving in marriage, where is neither Jew or Gentile, bond nor free. Adieu, always beloved ANNA. God forgive my sins." Again, in English, on another page, was written: "Blessed Jesus, who forgave the dying thief, have mercy on me. You know what sore temptations mean, for, according to Dr. WATTS, you have felt the same."

It was inferred that deceased had committed suicide. He was a Master Mason, and will be buried by the fraternity.

THE STOLEN ERIE STOCK.

Motion to Compel Jay Gould to Surrender Up the Stock—Arguments Before Judge Blatchford—Gould's Contempt of Court Commented On.

The case of HEATH and RAPHAEL, the English stockholders of the Erie Railway Company, vs. JAY GOULD, FREDERICK A. LANE, JAS. FISK, Jr., and the Directors of the railroad, was up for argument, yesterday, in the Circuit Court, before Judge BLATCHFORD, on a motion to compel GOULD to restore to the receiver 20,000 shares of stock which it is alleged he abstracted from the receivership of the Court, and also to forbid the Erie Railway Company from enlarging the registration of their stock at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, by putting upon it certain stock which was fraudulently issued in connection with the abstraction of the stock of HEATH and RAPHAEL.

Messrs. EVARTS and SOUTHMAYD appeared for the English shareholders, and Messrs. BEACH and STOUGHTON represented the Erie Railroad Company and JAY GOULD.

Mr. BEACH, in petitioning for a delay, called the attention of the Court to the fact that the original order made by the Court for the absolute handing over of these certificates of stock was subsequently modified, and the Master was commissioned to ascertain and report as to the validity of 20,000 shares said to have been issued by the Erie Railway Company, and registered upon the basis of 20,000 of these 40,000 shares in the custody of the Receiver. The hearing before the Master was culminated. On Tuesday last the case in behalf of HEATH and RAPHAEL terminated, and an application was made for permission to prove the ownership of the stock in dispute, but it was refused. His present motion was upon the papers served upon him in regard to the question now before the Court, and which the action of the other side did not afford him an opportunity of considering it. The papers were served upon him on Monday evening at 6 o'clock, and since then Mr. GOULD was unable to examine them. He had an affidavit to that effect, and if the Court should grant the application he intended to make for the enlargement of the order, the extension of the power of the Master, it appeared to him that all proceedings should be suspended until the report from the Master was completed. He read affidavits of Mr. WM. H. MORGAN, attorney for the Erie Railway Company, and Mr. GOULD, to the effect that the time afforded them for the examination of the papers was insufficient, and continued to say that all the merits of the entire litigation were involved in this motion. Mr. GOULD did not desire to delay the trial, and only asked for an opportunity to make himself familiar with the papers upon which this application was sought to be sustained.

Mr. SOUTHMAYD observed that the purport of the application was not correctly stated. It was not a motion to force Mr. GOULD to deliver up some property to which he lays claim, but to restore to the possession of the Court 20,000 shares of stock which were in its possession, and which he abstracted without the color of an excuse. He denied that there was anything in these papers which Mr. GOULD was unfamiliar with, and there was no question before the Court but the bare naked outrage of the abstraction of this stock from the receiver. Mr. GOULD never could realise any offense he had committed until he was brought into the Court for punishment. It reviewed the evidence before the Master, and countered that when Mr. GOULD found himself in a tight place he tried to sentpone the issue, but these who had been robbed had some rights, and the Court whose dignity was outraged was bound to take speedy cognizance of the matter.

Mr. BEACH maintained that there was no evidence to prove that Mr. GOULD ever interfered with the property in the custody of the Court. He merely used 20,000 shares of stock in the possession of the Erie Railroad as the basis of the registration for this new certificate. Counsel asserted that the object of the Erie Railroad Company in the present proceedings was to bring the property back to its true owners and to prevent HEATH and RAPHAEL from carrying this stock from the country to England in defiance of the rights of the resident American owners. Messrs. FISK and GOULD were large owners of this very stock, and they asked an opportunity to present their own title, yet for asserting their rights they are denounced as robbers and thieves. He asked for a delay to enable him to meet the motion properly, and arrive at the truth at the bottom of this litigation.

Mr. STOUGHTON said that this application, which involved the liberty of Mr. GOULD, was the most extraordinary he ever heard, and had no parallel in all the Courts in the civilized community.

The Court thought that a delay should be granted, and decided that the opening argument on the part of HEATH and RAPHAEL take place then, and the further hearing of the case be adjourned until next Thursday.

Mr. SOUTHMAYD then read the opening papers for HEATH and RAPHAEL.

Mr. BEACH read the affidavits made by JAY GOULD, JAMES FISK and JUSTIN D. WHITE. In the affidavit of GOULD it was stated that an offer had been made by an agent of HEATH and RAPHEL for a settlement of this litigation, and that after negotiation had proceeded in regard to the proposed settlement it was broken off.

Mr. SOUTHMAYD—I should like to know who the agent referred to was!

Mr. BEACH—The name of the gentleman was omitted from motives of delicacy.

Judge BLATCHFORD—If the name is not stated in the affidavit the Court will pay no attention to it.

Mr. BEACH—I am now informed that the name of the gentleman is Mr. THOMPSON.

Judge BLATCHFORD—The Court can take no notice of it unless it is mentioned in the affidavit.

Mr. SOUTHMAYD then commenced his argument in behalf of HEATH and RAPHAEL. In the course of his observations he said: What was the status of funds placed in the hands of a receiver appointed by a Court, and what was to be done with a person who fraudulently or injuriously dealt with funds so placed? He quoted opinions of Chancellor WALLWORTH bearing on these points. Property was in the hands of a receiver upon a distress warrant for rent. As the property was in the legal possession of the Court through its officers, it was a contempt of Court to remove it, and though the landlord might have been mistaken as to his rights the order of the Court was that it should be restored within twenty days by the party who took it, though he was not a party to the suit, yet had a prior claim to it. Any one who took such property was obliged to restore it. Any man who interfered with property in the hands of the Court rendered himself liable for it, and when he was called upon to restore it he could not throw himself back on his common law rights. If a man abstracted property from a Court, and had fuel enough to keep the fire going for ten years, the wrong would last for a long time, but the Court would compel him to restore it, or go to prison until he did. Through the ingenuity and unscrupulousness of Mr. GOULD, this litigation might be extended for five years. He applied the legal principles he enunciated to the present case, and observed that these 20,000 shares of stock, which ought to be in the possession of the receiver, were taken by GOULD to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, and upon the false representation that the new stock was issued upon its basis, got it certified, put upon the market, and the proceeds went into his own pocket. These new certificates were taken and re-dealt with by GOULD, were properly of the receivership and under the protection of the Court. This action of GOULD's effectively took away the market value of his client's stock, and invested it in his own false issue. He referred to Mr. GOULD's action in the premises as developed in the evidence, contending that there was no doubt of his personal responsibility in that regard. He denied the theory advanced in behalf of the Erie Railroad, and to which so much importance was attached, that the registration of stock at the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company was local, and did not affect its marketable value in Europe.

At this point of his argument the Court adjourned to Monday morning at 11 o'clock.

A Model Ocean Steamer.

The Atlantic, the sister ship to the Oceanic, the pioneer of the "White Star line," has arrived at this port, and is now docked at the Company's wharf at Jersey City. Never, perhaps, were two ships so exactly alike, and those interested in ocean craft who missed seeing the Oceanic will now have an opportunity of inspecting a vessel in every way her equal, and in some of her interior arrangements probably her superior. The Atlantic sails July 1, and has long since had every berth engaged for that date. The Oceanic, on her last voyage, carried 240 saloon passengers. This was, however, under exceptional conditions, and it has been since decided by the managers of the line that in future 130 saloon passengers only are to make up the full complement. She made the trip in eight days and six hours. The main saloon of the Atlantic can seat 300 comfortably. The Oceanic is now en route from Liverpool, and leaves this port on her return voyage July 8. The Baltic will leave Liverpool Aug. 1. The remaining three ships are well forward.

DR. LANAHAN REMOVED.

The Book Committee Decapitates the Assistant Agent—The Final Decision With the Bishops.

The Book Committee and Bishops JAMES, SCOTT and AMES were in secret session all day yesterday, considering and discussing the evidence in the case of Dr. LANAHAN. A portion of the testimony was read over and much time was occupied by members in setting forth their views. It was finally decided to come to a direct vote on the charges contained in Dr. CARLTON's letter of May 25, 1871, and, in spite of several attempts to adjourn, the body sat through after the noon recess till the charges were disposed of, which was not till about 7 o'clock in the evening.

Dr. LANAHAN was expelled from his office, as far as it lies within the power of the Committee to expel him, though the final decision in the matter lies with the Bishops, without whose sanction the Committee's action goes for nothing. The attitude of the Bishops in the question has not been developed. They have sat in their corner listening patiently all through the trial, but dropped not a word as to their opinions.

The Committee sustained the three charges separately and as a whole. The first one was voted upon in two parts. The first division charged that the Assistant Agent made an affidavit, and caused a proceeding to be instituted thereon, in the Supreme Court, for the purpose of procuring a writ of mandamus from said Court against the Book Concern and its Agent to compel free access to all the books, &c. This was not denied during the trial, and passed unanimously. The second division declared that "he based such assumption upon the improper assumption that he was an Agent a and corporator of said Book Concern, having equal power and authority with said Agent, &c.," all of which is contrary to his proper official conduct. On this vote the division was made which marks the attitude of each member of the Committee on the general question: Yeas—Messrs. Brooks, Blades, Bannister, Moore, Kennedy, Erwin, Rawlins, Bingham, Maltby, Rethweller, Woodruff—11. Nays—Messrs. Pike, Bilcer, Maltby, Vernon—4. The record was the same on the second charge, which declared "that the Assistant Agent has arrogated authority not accorded to him by any authority of the Church, and that his proceeding in a temporal Court tends to scandalize the Church and the Concern." On the third charge also the same vote was made. This specifies 1. Disregard and contempt of the authority of the Book Committee and of the Agent of the Book Concern. 2. Causing to be copied large portions of the books of account of the Concern and carrying the said copies away from the establishment. 3. Causing extracts from and copies and presented results of examination thereof by accountants to be printed secretly, without the knowledge of the Agent or conference with him. 4. He has threatened further legal proceedings if his demands are not complied with.

The act of removal was then carried by the same majority, the following resolutions being adopted:

Resolved, First—That the Book Concern having concluded the investigation of the complaint of Rev. THOMAS CARLTON, Agent of the Methodist Book Concern, dated May 25, 1871, against Rev. JOHN LANAHAN, Assistant Agent, and having entered upon findings upon the several terms of the complaint, it is our judgment that Rev. JOHN LANAHAN aforesaid should be removed from his office as Assistant Book Agent, and he is hereby removed.

Resolved, Second—That the Bishops in attendance be officially certified of this action of the Book Committee.

In taking this action the Committee acted on the ground that it is an executive rather than a judicial body. They do not claim to have ascertained whether or not there have been frauds in the Book Concern. They think that the public manner in which Dr. LANAHAN has brought his charges, and the pertinacity with which he has insisted upon them after they were disposed of by the Committee, has been detrimental to the Concern, and rendered him worse than useless as a subordinate officer. The prisoner, who claims to be a produce broker, denied the charge.

LOUIS LOKENSKI was taken to Philadelphia, yesterday, by Detective HEIDELBERG, on a charge of being concerned in disposing of goods valued at $600, which had been stolen from the store of M. SAMUELS, No. 1,046 South-street, Philadelphia.

CHAUNCEY SHAFFNER, the well-known lawyer, against whom Mr. CHARLES MCKAY, also a lawyer, procured a warrant for assault, voluntarily appeared at the Yorkville Police Court, yesterday, to answer the charge. The hearing of the case was adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock, Mr. SHAFFNER, in the meantime, being at liberty on his parol of honor.

At the Yorkville Police Court, yesterday, MEYER BARUCH, a Jewish doctor, was charged by his wife BARNETA, who resides at No. 226 East Thirtieth-street, with abandoning her and his two children. The doctor states that BARNETA is an extravagant woman, having spent $60,000 in a few years, and he is afraid if he lives with her that she will beggar him. The examination in the case was fixed for Monday week.

Between 5 and 6 o'clock yesterday morning Officer BROPHY, of the Twenty-first Precinct, heard a cry of "Stop thief," and saw a man running along Thirty-seventh-street toward Lexington-avenue, pursued by a crowd of citizens. The officer gave chase and captured the fellow, who gave his name as GEORGE RAY, and who is a notorious burglar. It appears that he and two others, who escaped, broke into the residence of Mr. WM. H. WILLEY, at No. 83 Park-avenue, and had about $5,000 worth of property in clothing, jewelry, silver-ware, &c., packed up ready to carry away, when they were alarmed and fled. In jumping over a fence which was spiked with iron, RAY's foot caught and his boot was torn off. He was taken to the Yorkville Police Court, and was fully committed by Justice COULTER.

Summarily Assault on an Officer.

Patrolman WILLIAM MELLIS, of the Tenth Precinct, about 1 o'clock yesterday morning, when on duty in Grand-street, near Ludlow-street, saw JOHN BARR, JOHN DOUGHERTY and JOHN FINNEGAN, all of whom he knew to be rough characters, acting in a very disorderly manner, although the two latter are members of the Fire Department. MELLIS ordered them to leave the corner, but instead of obeying, they made an insulting answer. He then attempted to make them leave, when he was assaulted by the three ruffians, who, wresting his club from him, knocked him down, and, while one struck him savagely about the head and body, the others were occupied in kicking him. MELLIS' cries were heard by Patrolman MARCUS HOEBLETZ, of the Third District Court Squad, who, hastening to the rescue of his imperiled comrade, snatched the club from DOUGHERTY and felled the latter and BARR to the pavement. An alarm rap was then given by HOEBLETZ, which brought Officers SCHMIDT and WALDRON to the scene, and the three ruffians were secured without further trouble. They were locked up at the Eldridge-street Police Station, and were arraigned, yesterday morning, before Justice SCOTT, at the Essex Market Police Court. They were committed, in default of $900 bail each for trial. The wounded officer was carried to his Station-house by his comrades, where his wounds, which were found to be of a very severe character, were dressed, after which he was taken home. The two of his assailants who are members of the Fire Department will have their conduct investigated before the Fire Commissioners.

An Aggravated Assault.

Yesterday, as Mr. DEWITT C. LAWRENCE, of LAWRENCE BROS. & Co., bankers, at No. 16 Wall-street, was entering a stage, he was suddenly and violently grasped by the arm by EDWARD T. RILEY, of No. 143 East Nineteenth-street, who insisted upon his taking a drink. Upon his refusal, RILEY made an outrageous assault upon him, inflicting severe wounds upon his head. Detective THOMAS arrested the assailant and locked him up in a room at Police Head-quarters. RILEY then upset the bed, demolished spittoons, water-closets and other articles. This performance raised such a clatter as to call the attention of the keeper. The prisoner was then placed in one of the basement cells, where his antics were repeated until he was seized and secured.

Greenwich-Street Dens.

Justice HOGAN was busily engaged during the greater part of yesterday at the Tombs Police Court in hearing one of the cases of the twelve disorderly houses pulled by Capt. BRIGHT in the Twenty-seventh Precinct on the previous night. The case was that of MARY PRITCHLER, who was in the basement of No. 150 Greenwich-street. There was the badgering of witnesses usual on such occasions, some of whom knew the house except by general repute. After some hours had been consumed in the investigation the hearing was postponed and the prisoner admitted to bail. In all the other cases the keepers of the houses seized are held for examination.

Another Friend of the New Departure Sings the Death-Song of the Democracy.

From the Richmond Whig, June 22.

The first great object to be aimed at by all persons in the North and in the South, of whatever political antecedents or past affiliations, is the defeat of Radicalism and the expulsion from power of that party. It should constantly be borne in mind that success can only be accomplished by an harmonious union of all the elements of opposition scattered throughout the country—Whig, Democratic and Conservative Republican. We put Whig first, because while as an organization the Whig Party no longer exists, we believe that the old Whig elements will have to be relied upon more than any other to achieve success. The Democratic organization still remains, and aspires to be the rallying point of all the various elements of opposition. That party, after a thousand defeats, still keeps its name and organization. But that is pretty much all left to it. The "new departure" will strip it of its former plumage and obliterate many of its former characteristics. It will have to assimilate itself to the spirit of the times, to adapt itself to the sentiments and impulses of the masses outside of it, and pursue such a policy as Democracy never before dreamed of. Should the mere accident of its having retained its name and organization gain it the advantage of nominal leadership in the great Presidential campaign of 1872, it will be none the less true that the victory, if won, will have to be won by men who have never been known as Democrats, and who would not have co-operated with that party but for its conformity in all save name to their views. The fact of the whole business is that the great movement now on foot—the new departure in politics—was inaugurated outside of the Democratic Party. It began here in Virginia and was bitterly opposed by many of the Democratic leaders. It was a popular movement outside of existing parties, and it took the name "Conservative," which name it keeps to this day. These things should be remembered, and the movement, when expanded into a national one, should not lose its characteristics.
